EXTRACTS FROM STATUTES AUTHORIZING THE CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL OF HONOR, THE DISTINGUISHED-SERVICE CROSS, AND THE DISTINGUISHED-SERVICE MEDAL

A resolution to provide for the presentation of "medals of honor" to the enlisted men of the Army and Volunteer Forces who have distinguished, or may distinguish, themselves in battle during the present rebellion.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause two thousand "medals of honor" to be prepared with suitable emblematic devices, and to direct that the same be presented, in the name of Congress, to such noncommissioned officers and privates as shall most distinguish themselves by their gallantry in action, and other soldier-like qualities, during the present insurrection. And that the sum of ten thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying this resolution into effect.

Approved, July 12, 1862.

An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June thirty, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, and for the year ending the 30(th) of June, 1863, and for other purposes.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the President cause to be struck from the dies recently prepared at the United States mint for that purpose, "medals of honor" additional to those authorized by the act (resolution) of July twelfth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and present the same to such officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates as have most distinguished, or who may hereafter most distinguish, themselves in action; and the sum of twenty thousand dollars is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of the same.

Approved, March 3, 1863.

[Extract from the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, approved July 9, 1918]

Medals of honor, distinguished-service crosses, and distinguished-service medals.—That the provisions of existing law relating to the award of medals of honor to officers, noncommissioned officers, and privates of the Army be, and they hereby are, amended so that the President is authorized to present, in the name of the Congress, a medal of honor only to each person who, while an officer or enlisted man of the Army, shall hereafter, in action involving actual conflict with an enemy, distinguish himself conspicuously by gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty.

That the President be, and he is hereby, further authorized to present, but not in the name of Congress, a distinguished-service cross of appropriate design and a ribbon, together with rosette or other device, to be worn in lieu thereof, to any person who, while serving in any capacity with the Army of the United States since the sixth day of April, nineteen hundred and seventeen, has distinguished, or who shall hereafter distinguish, himself or herself by extraordinary heroism in connection with military operations against an armed enemy.

That the President be, and he is hereby, further authorized to present, but not in the name of Congress, a distinguished-service medal of appropriate design and a ribbon, together with a rosette or other device, to be worn in lieu thereof, to any person who, while serving in any capacity with the Army of the United States since the sixth day of April nineteen hundred and seventeen, has distinguished, or who hereafter shall distinguish, himself or herself by exceptionally meritorious service to the Government in a duty of great responsibility; and said distinguished-service medal shall also be issued to all enlisted men of the Army to whom the certificate of merit has been granted up to and including the date of the passage of this act under the provisions of previously existing law, in lieu of such certificates of merit, and after the passage of this act the award of the certificate of merit for distinguished service shall cease; and additional pay heretofore authorized by law for holders of the certificate of merit shall not be paid to them beyond the date of the award of the distinguished-service medal in lieu thereof as aforesaid.

That each enlisted man of the Army to whom there has been or shall be awarded a medal of honor, a distinguished-service cross, or a distinguished-service medal shall, for each such award, be entitled to additional pay at the rate of $2 per month from the date of the distinguished act or service on which the award is based, and each bar, or other suitable device, in lieu of a medal of honor, a distinguished-service cross, or a distinguished-service medal, as hereinafter provided for, shall entitle him to further additional pay at the rate of $2 per month from the date of the distinguished act or service for which the bar is awarded, and said additional pay shall continue throughout his active service, whether such service shall or shall not be continuous; but when the award is in lieu of the certificate of merit, as provided for in section three hereof, the additional pay shall begin with the date of the award.

That no more than one medal of honor or one distinguished-service cross or one distinguished-service medal shall be issued to any one person; but for each succeeding deed or act sufficient to justify the award of a medal of honor or a distinguished-service cross, or a distinguished-service medal, respectively, the President may award a suitable bar, or other suitable device, to be worn as he shall direct; and for each other citation of an officer or enlisted man for gallantry in action published in orders issued from the headquarters of a force commanded by a general officer he shall be entitled to wear, as the President shall direct, a silver star three-sixteenths of an inch in diameter.

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend from the appropriations for contingent expenses of his department from time to time so much as may be necessary to defray the cost of the medals of honor, distinguished-service crosses, distinguished-service medals, bars, rosettes, and other devices hereinbefore provided for.

That whenever a medal, cross, bar, ribbon, rosette, or other device presented under the provisions of this act shall have been lost, destroyed, or rendered unfit for use, without fault or neglect on the part of the person to whom it was awarded, such medal, cross, bar, ribbon, rosette, or device shall be replaced without charge therefor.

That, except as otherwise prescribed herein, no medals of honor, distinguished-service cross, distinguished-service medal, or bar, or other suitable device in lieu of either of said medals or of said cross, shall be issued to any person after more than three years from the date of the act justifying the award thereof, nor unless a specific statement or report distinctly setting forth the distinguished service and suggesting or recommending official recognition thereof shall have been made at the time of the distinguished service or within two years thereafter, nor unless it shall appear from official records in the War Department that such person has so distinguished himself as to entitle him thereto; but in case an individual who shall distinguish himself dies before the making of the award to which he may be entitled, the award may, nevertheless, be made and the medal or cross or the bar or other emblem or device presented within three years from the date of the act justifying the award thereof to such representative of the deceased as the President may designate; but no medal, cross, bar, or other device, hereinbefore authorized, shall be awarded or presented to any individual whose entire service subsequently to the time he distinguished himself shall not have been honorable; but in cases of officers and enlisted men now in the Army for whom the award of the medal of honor has been recommended in full compliance with then existing regulations but on account of services which, though insufficient fully to justify the award of the medal of honor, appear to have been such as to justify the award of the distinguished-service cross or distinguished-service medal hereinbefore provided for, such cases may be considered and acted upon under the provisions of this act authorizing the award of the distinguished-service cross and distinguished-service medal, notwithstanding that said services may have been rendered more than three years before said cases shall have been considered as authorized by this act, but all consideration of and action upon any of said cases shall be based exclusively upon official records now on file in the War Department; and in the cases of officers and enlisted men now in the Army who have been mentioned in orders, now a part of official records, for extraordinary heroism or especially meritorious services, such as to justify the award of the distinguished-service cross or the distinguished-service medal hereinbefore provided for, such cases may be considered and acted on under the provisions of this act, notwithstanding that said act or services may have been rendered more than three years before said cases shall have been considered as authorized by this act, but all consideration of and action upon any said cases shall be based exclusively upon official records of the War Department.

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to delegate, under such conditions, regulations, and limitations as he shall prescribe, to the commanding general of a separate army or higher unit in the field, the power conferred upon him by this act to award the medal of honor, the distinguished-service cross, and the distinguished-service medal; and he is further authorized to make from time to time any and all rules, regulations, and orders which he shall deem necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act and to execute the full purpose and intention thereof.

That the President is authorized, under regulations to be prescribed by him, to confer such medals and decorations as may be authorized in the military service of the United States upon officers and enlisted men of the military forces of the countries concurrently engaged with the United States in the present war.

Captain, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.

While his company was crossing the Meuse River and canal at a bridgehead opposite Clery-le-Petit, the bridge over the canal was destroyed by shell fire and Captain Allworth's command became separated, part of it being on the east bank of the canal and the remainder on the west bank. Seeing his advance units making slow headway up the steep slope ahead, this officer mounted the canal bank and called for his men to follow. Plunging in he swam across the canal under fire from the enemy, followed by his men. Inspiring his men by his example of gallantry, he led them up the slope, joining his hard-pressed platoons in front. By his personal leadership he forced the enemy back for more than a kilometer, overcoming machine-gun nexts and capturing 100 prisoners, whose number exceeded that of the men in his command. The exceptional courage and leadership displayed by Captain Allworth made possible the reestablishment of a bridgehead over the canal and the successful advance of other troops.

First lieutenant, 5th U. S. Artillery. Remained upon the field in command of a section of Griffin's Battery, directing its fire after being severely wounded and refusing to leave the field until too weak to sit upon the caisson where he had been placed by men of his command.

Private, Company B, 148th Pennsylvania Infantry. Capture of battle flag of 8th North Carolina (C. S. A.), being one of the foremost in the assault.

Corporal, Company B, 1st North Dakota Volunteer Infantry.
With 11 other scouts, without waiting for the supporting battalion to aid them or to get into a position to do so, charged over a distance of about 150 yards and completely routed about 300 of the enemy who were in line and in a position that could only be carried by a frontal attack.

Private, Company K, 142d New York Infantry. Voluntarily advanced with the head of the column and cut down the palisading.

Private, Company K, 1st New York (Lincoln) Cavalry. Capture of unknown Confederate flag.

Sergeant, Company M, 15th Pennsylvania Cavalry. Captured, single handed, a Confederate general during a charge upon the enemy.

Private, Company A, 18th Massachusetts Infantry. Capture of battle flag of 27th South Carolina (C. S. A.) and the color bearer.

Private, Company M, 6th U.S. Cavalry. Gallantry during the pursuit and fight with Indians.

First sergeant, Company B, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
While his company was being held up by intense artillery and machine-gun fire, Sergeant Anderson, without aid, voluntarily left the company and worked his way to the rear of the nest that was offering the most stubborn resistance.
His advance was made through an open area and under constant hostile fire, but the mission was successfully accomplished, and he not only silenced the gun and captured it, but also brought back with him 23 prisoners.

Captain, Company D, 51st Indiana Infantry. Led his regiment over five lines of the enemy's works, where he fell, severely wounded.

Private, Company B, 31st Wisconsin Infantry.

Entirely unassisted, brought from the field an abandoned piece of artillery and saved the gun from falling into the hands of the enemy.

Corporal, Company I, 1st West Virginia Cavalry. Capture of Confederate flag.

Corporal, Company I, 12th West Virginia Infantry. Conspicuous gallantry as color bearer in the assault on Fort Gregg.

Second lieutenant, 148th Infantry, 37th Division. Upon hearing that a squad leader of his platoon had been severely wounded while attempting to capture an enemy machine-gun nest about 200 yards in advance of the assault line and somewhat to the right, Lieutenant Baesel requested permission to go to the rescue of the wounded corporal. After requested permission to go to the rescue of the worlded corporal. After thrice repeating his request and permission having been reluctantly given, due to the heavy artillery, rifle, and machine-gun fire and heavy deluge of gas in which the company was at the time, accompanied by a volunteer he worked his way forward, and in spite of a heavy direct machine-gun fire succeeded in reaching the wounded man, whom he just succeeded in placing upon his shoulders when both were instantly killed by enemy fire. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Albert E. Baesel. Posthumously awarded.

Sergeant, Company E, 5th U. S. Cavalry.
Gallant conduct during the campaigns and engagements with Apaches.

Brigadier general, U. S. Volunteers. Voluntarily led a detached brigade in an assault upon the enemy's works.

First lieutenant and adjutant, 5th U. S. Infantry.

Most distinguished gallantry in action with the Nez Percé Indians.

Sergeant major, 10th U.S. Cavalry. Left cover and, under fire, rescued a wounded comrade from drowning.

Musician, Company D, 5th U.S. Infantry. Gallantry in engagements.

Captain, Company D. 19th Michigan Infantry.

Led his company in a countercharge, under a galling fire ahead of his own men, and singly entered the enemy's line, capturing and bringing back two commissioned officers, fully armed, besides a guidon of a Georgia regiment. First lieutement, 5th U. S. Infantry.

Rescued, with two companies, two white girls by a voluntary attack upon Indians whose superior numbers and strong position would have warranted delay for reinforcements, but which delay would have permitted the Indians to escape and kill their captives.

Private, Company B, 47th Ohio Infantry. Was one of a party that volunteered and attempted to run the enemy's bat-teries with a steam tug and two barges loaded with subsistence stores.

Private, Company A, 7th U. S. Cavalry. Brought water for the wounded under a most galling fire.

Sergeant, Company C, 15th Indiana Infantry.

As color bearer, led his regiment in the assault, and, though wounded, carried the flag forward to the enemy's works, where he was again wounded. In a brigade of eight regiments this flag was the first planted on the parapet.

Corporal, Company G, 1st Rhode Island Light Artillery.
Was one of a detachment of 20 picked artillerymen who voluntarily accompanied an infantry assaulting party, and who turned upon the enemy the guns captured in the assault.

Private, first class, Company L, 354th Infantry, 89th Division. Learning that two daylight patrols had been caught out in No Man's Land and were unable to return, Private Barger and another stretcher bearer upon their own initiative made two trips 500 yards beyond our lines, under constant machine-gun fire, and rescued two wounded officers.

Private, Company E, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.
When information was desired as to the enemy's position on the opposite side of the River Meuse, Private Barkeley, with another soldier, volunteered without hesitation and swam the river to recompoter the exact location. He succeeded in reaching the opposite bank, despite the evident determination of the enemy to prevent a crossing. Having obtained his information, he again entered the water for his return, but before his goal was reached, he was seized with cramps and drowned.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Antonio Barkeley.

Sergeant, Company E, 11th New Hampshire Infantry. Six color bearers of the regiment having been killed, he voluntarily took both flags of the regiment and carried them through the remainder of the battle.

Private, first class, Company K, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.

Private Barkley, who was stationed in an observation post half a kilometer from the German line, on his own initiative repaired a captured enemy machine gun and mounted it in a disabled French tank near his post. Shortly afterwards, when the enemy launched a counterattack against our forces, Private Barkley got into the tank, waited under the hostile barrage until the enemy line was abreast of him, and then opened fire, completely breaking up the counterattack and killing and wounding a large number of the enemy. Five minutes later an enemy 77-millimeter gun opened fire on the tank point-blank. One shell struck the drive wheel of the tank, but this soldier nevertheless remained in the tank and after the barrage ceased broke up a second enemy counter attack, thereby combling our forces to gain and hold Hill 25

B.—Alexandria, La. Sonora,

Private, Company I, 83d Indiana Infantry. Gallantry in the charge of the "volunteer storming party."

First lieutenant, Company D, 9th Michigan Cavalry.
While acting as aid, voluntarily led a part of the line into the fight, and was twice wounded.

Assistant surgeon, 1st U. S. Volunteer Cavalry.

In addition to performing gallantly the duties pertaining to his position, voluntarily and unaided carried several seriously wounded men from the firing line to a secure position in the rear, in each instance being subjected to a very heavy fire and great exposure and danger.

Corporal, Company G, 2d Illinois Light Artillery.
When the fire of the enemy's batteries compelled the men of his detachment for a short time to seek shelter, he stood manfully at his post and for some minutes worked his gun alone.

Captain, Company C, 2d Minnesota Infantry. Seized the colors of a retreating regiment and led it into the thick of the attack.

Sergeant, Company C, 1st New Jersey Cavalry.
Shot the Confederate General Dunovant dead during a charge, thus confusing the enemy and greatly aiding in his repulse.

Musician, Company E, 1st U.S. Artillery. Twice voluntarily rescued wounded comrades under fire of the enemy.

First sergeant, Company G, 2d Ohio Cavalry. Capture of battle flag of the 8th Florida Infantry (C. S. A.).

Lieutenant and adjutant, 6th Maine Infantry.

Having voluntarily taken command of his regiment in the absence of its commander, at great personal risk and with remarkable presence of mind and fertility of resource led the command down an exceedingly precipitous embankment to the Rappalannock River and by his gallantry, coolness, and good judgment in the face of the enemy saved the command from capture or Corporal, Company E, 125th New York Infantry. Seized the colors and advanced with them after the color bearer had been shot.

Private, Company F, 88th Pennsylvania Infantry. Distinguished bravery in action; was severely wounded.

First lieutenant and regimental quartermaster, 6th Vermont Infantry. Defended the division train against a vastly superior force of the enemy; he was severely wounded, but remained in the saddle for 20 hours afterwards, until he had brought his train through in safety.

Private, Company L, 2d U. S. Cavalry. Conspicuous gallantry; especial skill as sharpshooter.

Corporal, Company H, 2d Minnesota Infantry. Was one of a detachment of 16 men who heroically defended a wagon train against the attack of 125 cavalry, repulsed the attack, and saved the train.

Captain, Company F, 2d Vermont Infantry. Distinguished conduct in a desperate hand-to-hand fight while commanding the regiment.

Second licutenant, 10th U. S. Cavalry.
Rushed forward to the rescue of a soldier who was severely wounded and lay, disabled, exposed to the enemy's fire, and carried him to a place of safety.

After his platoon had gained its objective along a railroad embankment, Private Dilboy, accompanying his platoon leader to reconnoiter the ground beyond, was suddenly fired upon by an enemy machine gun from 100 yards. From a standing position on the railroad track, fully exposed to view, he opened fire at once, but, failing to silence the gun, rushed forward with his bayonet, fixed, through a wheat field toward the gun emplacement, falling within 25 yards of the gun with his right leg nearly severed above the knee and with several bullet holes in his body. With undaunted courage he continued to fire into the emplacement from a prone position, killing two of the enemy and dispersing the rest of the crew. and dispersing the rest of the crew. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Antone Dilboy.

Captain, Battery I, 1st Ohio Light Artillery.
Fought his guns until the enemy were upon him, then with one gun hauled in the road by hand he formed the rear guard and kept the enemy at bay by the rapidity of his fire and was the last man in the retreat.

1876, to Jan. 8, 1877, R-Chicago, Ill, B-Germany,

Sergeant, Company D, 354th Infantry, 89th Division.
When the advance of his company was stopped by bursts of fire from a nest of six enemy machine guns, without being discovered, he worked his way single handed to a point within 50 yards of the machine-gun nest. Charging, single handed, he drove out the enemy in disorder, thereby protecting the advance platoon from annihilating fire, and permitting the resumption of the advance of the company.

First sergeant, Company M, 4th U. S. Cavalry.

Though dangerously wounded, he maintained his ground with a small party against a largely superior force after his commanding officer had been shot down during a sudden attack and rescued that officer and a comrade from the enemy.

Sergeant, Company F, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
When his company was held up by violent machine-gun fire from a sunken road, Sergeant Foster with an officer went forward to attack the hostile machine-gun nests. The officer was wounded, but Sergeant Foster continued on alone in the face of the heavy fire and by effective use of hand grenades and his pistol killed several of the enemy and captured 18.

Sergeant, Company F, 4th U.S. Cavalry. Gallantry in action.

Private, Company H, 21st U. S. Infantry.
Gallantly assisted in the rescue of the wounded from in front of the lines and while under heavy fire of the enemy.

Second lieutenant, 15th Battery Indiana Light Artillery.
Voluntarily gathered the men of the battery together, remanned the guns, which had been ordered abandoned by an officer, opened fire, and kept up the same on the enemy until after the surrender.

Sergeant, Company H, 106th Illinois Infantry. when his command was surrounded by a greatly superior force, voluntarily left the shelter of the breastworks, crossed an open railway trestle under a concentrated fire from the enemy, made his way out and secured reinforcements for the relief of his command.

Sergeant, Company M, 5th Michigan Cavalry. Capture of flag.

Private, Company H, 28th Connecticut Infantry.

Made two trips across an open space in the face of the enemy's concentrated fire, and secured water for the sick and wounded.

Private, Company A, 95th Pennsylvania Infantry.
Bravely assisted in the capture of one of the enemy's guns; with the first troops to enter the city, captured the flag of the Confederate customhouse.

Private, Company E, 83d Indiana Infantry.
Gallantry in the charge of the "volunteer storming party."

Private, Company I, 97th Illinois Infantry. Gallantry in the charge of the "volunteer storming party."

Private, Company E, 124th New York Infantry. Capture of flag of 17th Louisiana (C. S. A.).

First lieutenant, 18th U. S. Infantry.
Voluntarily went to the front and picked up and earried to a place of safety, under a heavy fire from the enemy, an acting field officer who had been wounded and was about to fall into the enemy's hands.

Private, Company B, 169th New York Infantry. Volunteered to carry the brigade flag after the bearer was wounded.

Private, Company D, 5th U.S. Infantry. Gallantry in actions.

Continued fighting, although wounded, until he fainted from loss of blood.

Corporal, Company H, 37th Ohio Infantry. Gallantry in the charge of the "volunteer storming party."

Colonel, 129th Pennsylvania Infantry. Seized the colors and led the command through a terrible fire of cannon and musketry. In a hand-to-hand fight, recaptured the colors of his regiment.

Private, Company B, 6th Missouri Infantry. Gallantry in the charge of the "volunteer storming party."

Sergeant, Battery A, 4th U. S. Artillery.

All the officers of his battery having been killed or wounded and five of its guns disabled in Pickett's assault, he succeeded to the command and fought the remaining gun with most distinguished gallantry until the battery was ordered withdrawn.

Private, first class, Company L, 354th Infantry, 89th Division.
Learning that two daylight patrols had been caught out in No Man's Land and were unable to return, Private Funk and another stretcher bearer, upon their own initiative, made two trips 500 yards beyond our lines under constant machine-gun fire and rescued two wounded officers.

Major, 121st Pennsylvania Infantry. Capture of flag of 46th Virginia Infantry (C. S. A.).

Colonel, 20th Kansas Volunteer Infantry.

Crossed the river on a raft and by his skill and daring enabled the general commanding to carry the enemy's entrenched position on the north bank of the river and to drive him with great loss from the important strategic position of Calumpit.

First lieutenant, 353d Infantry, 89th Division.

Immediately after the opening of the attack in the Bois-de-Bantheville, when his company was held up by severe machine-gun fire from the front, which killed his company commander and several soldiers, Lieutenant Furlong moved out in advance of the line with great courage and coolness, crossing an open space several hundred yards wide. Taking up a position behind the liue of machine guns, he closed in on them, one at a time, killing a number of the enemy with his rifle, putting four machine-gun nests out of action, and driving 20 German prisoners into our lines.

Corporal, Company A, 6th Pennsylvania Reserves.
Was one of six volunteers who charged upon a log house near the Devil's Den, where a squad of the enemy's sharpshooters were sheltered, and compelled their surrender.

Captain, Company F, 6th Pennsylvania Cavalry.
Voluntarily carried a box of anmunition across an open space swept by the enemy's fire to the relief of an outpost whose ammunition had become almost exhausted, but which was thus enabled to hold its important position.

Private, first class, Company G, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.
Private Gaffney, an automatic rifleman, pushing forward alone with his gun, after all the other members of his squad had heen killed, discovered several Germans placing a heavy machine gun in position. He killed the crew, captured the gun, bombed several dagouts, and, after killing four more of the enemy with his pistol, held the position until reinforcements came up, when 80 prisoners were captured.

Private, Company D, 104th Illinois Infantry. Voluntarily joined a small party that, under a heavy fire, captured a stockade and saved the bridge.

Corporal, Company C, 9th U. S. Cavalry. Gallantry in a hand-to-hand fight.

Captain, Company F, 4th Missouri Cavalry.
While acting as aid and carrying orders across a most dangerous part of the battlefield, being hindered by a Confederate advance, seized a rifle, took a place in the ranks, and was conspicuous in repulsing the enemy.

Sergeant, Company K, 8th U. S. Cavalry. Bravery in actions.

Corporal, Company H, 11th Ohio Infantry. Scaled the enemy's works and in a hand-to-hand fight captured a flag.

Major, 1st U. S. Cavalry.

In order to reassure his command, this officer, in the most fearless manner and exposed to very great danger, walked in front of the line; the command, thus encouraged, advanced over the lava upon the Indians who were concealed among the rocks.

Private, Company G, 104th Ohio Infantry. Capture of corps headquarters flag (C. S. A.).

Major and assistant adjutant general, U. S. Army. Formed the columns under heavy fire and put them into position.

Second lieutenant, 4th U. S. Irrantry.

Charged alone an insurgent outpost with his pistol, killing one, wounding two, and capturing three insurgents with their rifles and equipments.

Private, Company F, 133d Ohio Infantry.
Voluntarily returned to the breastworks which his regiment had been forced to abandon to notify three missing companies that the regiment was falling back; found the enemy already in the works, refused a demand to surrender, returning to his command, under a concentrated fire, several bullets passing through his hat and clothing.

Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 116th Infantry, 29th Division. With the remark "I will get them," Sergt. Gregory seized a rifle and a trenchmortar shell, which he used as a hand grenade, left his detachment of the trench-mortar platoon, and, advancing ahead of the infantry, captured a machine gun and three of the enemy. Advancing still farther from the machine-gun nest, he captured a 7.5-centimeter mountain howitzer and, entering a dugout in the immediate vicinity, single-handed captured 19 of the enemy.

Second lieutenant, Company C, 61st New York Infantry.

A Confederate regiment, having planted its battle flag slightly in advance of the regiment, this officer rushed forward and seized it, and, although shot through the neck, retained the flag and brought it within the Union lines.

First lieutenant, 7th U. S. Cavalry. Voluntarily led a party into a ravine to dislodge Indians concealed therein.

Corporal, Company D, 128th Pennsylvania Infantry. While exposed to the fire of the enemy, carried from the field a wounded comrade.

Sergeant, Company G, 72d New York Infantry.

Voluntarily carried a severely wounded comrade off the field in the face of a large force of the enemy; in doing so was himself severely wounded and taken prisoner.

Went into the fight, although severely disabled.

Volunteered to search the woods for the wounded.

Corporal, Company E, 1st Michigan Sharpshooters. Instead of retreating, remained in the captured works, regardless of his personal safety and exposed to the firing, which he boldly and deliberately returned until the enemy was close upon him.

Chaplain, 16th New York Infantry. Voluntarily exposed himself to a heavy fire during the thickest of the fight and carried wounded men to the rear for treatment and attendance.

Second lieutenant, Company G, 27th New York Infantry, and captain, Company F, 121st New York Infantry. Although wounded, he remained on duty and participated in the battle with his company.

While acting as aid, rendered gallant and prompt assistance in re-forming the regiments inside the enemy's works.

Private, Company B, 8th U. S. Cavalry. Bravery in scouts and actions with Indians.

Corporal, Company I, 104th Ohio Infantry. Capture of flag, believed to have belonged to Stewart's Corps (C. S. A.).

Sergeant, Company G, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
Having overcome two machine-gun nests under his skillful leadership, Sergeant Hall's platoon was stopped 800 yards from its final objective by machine-gun fire of particular intensity. Ordering his men to take cover in a sunken road, he advanced alone on the enemy machine-gun post and killed five members of the crew with his bayonet and thereby made possible the further advance of the line. While attacking another machine-gun nest later in the day this gallaut soldier was mortally wounded.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, William L. Hall.

At the head of his regiment charged a field battery with strong infantry supports.

broke the enemy's line and, with other mounted troops, captured three guns and many prisoners.

Captain, Company C, 6th New York Cavalry.

Took command of the regiment as its senior officer when surrounded by Stuart's Cavalry. The regiment cut its way through the enemy's line and escaped, but Captain Heermanco was desperately wounded, left for dead on the field. and was taken prisoner.

Private, Company B, 8th U. S. Cavalry. Bravery in scouts and actions with Indians.

Sergeant, Company A, 66th Ohio Infantry.

One of a party of four who, under heavy fire, voluntarily brought into the Union lines a wounded Confederate officer from whom was obtained valuable information concerning the position of the enemy.

Private, Company B, 83d Indiana Infantry.
Gallantry in the charge of the "volunteer storming party."

Sergeant, Troop B, 6th U. S. Cavalry. While in action against hostile Moros, voluntarily advanced alone, in the face of a heavy fire, to within about 15 yards of the hostile position and refastened to a tree a block and tackle used in checking the recoil of a mountain gun.

Colonel, 40th Massachusetts Infantry. Led the assaults of his brigade upon the enemy's works, where he had two horses shot under him.

Sergeant, Company B, 113th Illinois Infantry. Gallantry in the charge of the "volunteer storming party."

See John H. Shingle, true name.

Colonel, 10th Vermont Infantry.

Though suffering from severe wounds, rejoined his regiment and led it in a brilliant charge, recapturing the guns of an abandoned battery.

Private, Company E, 11th Iowa Infantry. With one companion and under a fierce fire of the enemy at close range, went to the rescue of a wounded comrade who had fallen between the lines and carried him to a place of safety.

Corporal, Company I, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
Corporal Heriot, with four other soldiers, organized a combat group and attacked an enemy machine-gun nest which had been inflicting heavy casualties on his company. In the advance two of his men were killed, and because ties on his company. In the advance two of his men were kined, and because of the heavy fire from all sides the remaining two sought shelter. Unmindful of the hazard attached to his mission, Corporal Heriot, with fixed bayonet, alone charged the machine gun, making his way through the fire for a distance of 30 yards and forcing the enemy to surrender. During this exploit he received several wounds in the arm, and later in the same day, while charging another nest, he was killed.

Becoming separated from their platoon by a smoke barrage, Sergeant Latham, Sergeant Alan L. Eggers, and Corporal Thomas E. O'Shea took cover in a shell hole well within the enemy's lines. Upon bearing a call for help from an American tank which had become disabled 30 yards from them, the three soldiers left their shelter and started toward the tank under heavy fire from soldiers left their shelter and started toward the tank under heavy her from German machine guns and trench mortars. In crossing the fire-swept area, Corporal O'Shea was mortally wounded, but his companions, undeterred, proceeded to the tank, rescued a wounded officer, and assisted two wounded soldiers to cover in the sap of a near-by trench. Sergeant Latham and Sergeant Eggers then returned to the tank in the face of the violent fire, dismonnted a Hotchkiss gun, and took it back to where the wounded men were, keeping off the enemy all day by effective use of the gun and later bringing it with the wounded men back to our lines under cover of darkness.

Private, Troop M, 10th U. S. Cavalry.
Voluntarily went ashore in the face of the enemy and aided in the rescue of his wounded comrades, this after several previous attempts had been frustrated.

First, sergeant Company G, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.

Seeing that the lett flank o. his company was held up, he located the enemy machine-gun emplacement, which had been causing heavy casulties. In the face of heavy fire he rushed it single handed, killing the entire crew with grenades. Continuing along the enemy trench in advance of the company, he reached another emplacement, which he also charged, silencing the gun with grenades. A third machine-gun emplacement opened upon him from the left and with similar skill and bravery he destroyed this also. Later, in company with another sergeant, he attacked a fourth machine-gun nest, being killed as he reached the parapet of the emplacement. His courageous action in destroying in turn four enemy machine-gun nests prevented many casualties among his company and very materially aided in achieving the objective. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Nellie V. Lemert.

Commanded a battalion which was cut off and surrounded by the enemy and, although wounded in the knee by shrapnel on October 4 and suffering great pain, he continued throughout the entire period to encourage his officers and men with a resistless optimism that contributed largely toward preventing panic and disorder among the troops, who were without food, cut off from communication with our lines. On October 4, during a heavy barrage, he personally directed and supervised the moving of the wounded to shelter before himself seeking shelter. On October 6 he was again wounded in the shoulder by a German grenade, but continued personally to organize and direct the defense against the German attack on the position until the attack was defeated. He continued to direct and command his troops, refusing relief, and personally led his men out of the position after assistance arrived before permitting himself to be taken to the hospital on October 8. During this period the successful defense of the position was due largely to his efforts.

Captain, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.

Becoming separated from the halance of his company because of a fog, Captain Mallon, with nine soldiers, pushed forward and attacked nine active hostile machine guns, capturing all of them without the loss of a man. Continuing on through the woods, he led his men in attacking a hattery of four 155-millimeter howitzers, which were in action, rushing the position and capturing the hattery and its crew. In this encounter Captain Mallon personally attacked one of the enemy with his fists. Later, when the party came upon two more machine guns, this officer sent men to the flanks while he rushed forward directly in the face of the fire and silenced the guns, being the first one of the party to reach the nest. The exceptional gallantry and determination displayed by Captain Mallon resulted in the capture of 100 prisoners, 11 machine guns, four 155-millimeter howitzers and one antiaircraft gun.

First sergeant, Company B, 4th New York Cavalry, Capture of flag of 3d Virginia Infantry (C. S. A.).

Private, Company H, 148th New York Infantry. Capture of flag of 8th Mississippi Infantry (C. S. A.).

Private, Company K, 29th Massachusetts Infantry. Capture of flag of 16th or 18th Georgia Infantry (C. S. A.). Corporal, Company G, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.

When his platoon commander and platoon sergeant had both become casualties soon after the beginning of an assault on strongly fortified heights overlooking the Ourcq River, Corporal Manning took command of his platoon, which was near the center of the attacking line. Though himself severely wounded he led forward the 35 men remaining in the platoon and finally succeeded in gaining a foothold on the encmy's position, during which time he had received more wounds and all but seven of his men had fallen. Directing the consolidation of the position, he held off a large body of the enemy only 50 yards away by fire from his automatic rifle. He declined to take cover until the line had been entirely consolidated with the line of the platoon on the flank, when he dragged himself to shelter, suffering from nine wounds in all parts of the body.

First lieutenant, 2d Independent Battery, Massachusetts Light Artillery. After having been surrounded by the enemy's cavalry, his support having surrendered, he ordered a charge and saved the section of the battery that was under his command.

Captain, Company D, 24th New York Cavalry.

During an assault and in the face of a heavy fire rendered heroic assistance to a wounded and helpless officer, thereby saving his life and in the performance of this gallant act sustained a severe wound.

Captain, 308th Infantry, 77th Division. Volunteered to lead his company in a hazardous attack on a commanding trench position near the Aisne Canal, which other troops had previously attempted to take without success. His company immediately met with intense machine gun fire, against which it had no artillery assistance, but Captain Miles preceded the first wave and assisted in cutting a passage through the enemy's wire entanglements. In so doing he was wounded five times by machine-gun bullets, both legs and one arm being fractured, whereupon he ordered himself placed on a stretcher and had himself carried forward to the enemy trench in order that he might encourage and direct his company, which by this time had suffered numerous casualties. Under the inspiration of this officer's indomitable spirit his men held the hostile position and consolidated the front line after an action lasting two hours, at the conclusion of which Captain Miles was carried to the aid station against his will.

After two days of intense physical and mental strain, during which Major Miller had led his battalion in the front line of the advance through the forest of Argonne, the enemy was met in a prepared position south of Gesnes. Though almost exhausted, he energetically reorganized his hattalion and ordered an attack. Upon reaching open ground, the advancing line began to waver in the face of machine-gun fire from the front and flanks and direct artillery fire. Personally leading his command group forward between his front-line companies, Major Miller inspired his men by his personal courage, and they again pressed on toward the hostile position. As this officer led, the renewed attack he was shot in the right leg, but he nevertheless staggered forward at the head of his command. Soon afterwards he was again shot in the right arm, but he continued the charge, personally cheering his troops on through the heavy machine-gun fire. Just before the objective was reached he received a wound in the abdomen, which forced him to the ground, but he continued to urge his men on, telling them to push on to the next ridge and leave him where he lay. He died from his wounds a few days later.

Corporal, Company F, 5th U.S. Cavalry. Gallantry in action.

Private, Company F, 8th U. S. Cavalry. Gallantry in action.

Captain, Company L, 37th Infantry, U. S. Volunteers.

After the attacking party had become demoralized, fearlessly led a small body of troops under a severe fire and through water waist deep in the attack against the enemy.

Private, Company M., 28th Infantry, 1st Division. While his company was being held up by heavy enemy fire Private Morelock, with three other men who were acting as runners at company headquarters, voluntarily led them as a patrol in advance of his company's front line through an intense ritle, artillery, and machine-gun fire and penetrated a woods which formed the German front line. Encountering a series of five hostile machine-gun nests, containing from one to five machine guns each, with his patrol he cleaned them all out, gained and held complete mastery of the situation until the arrival of his company commander with reinforcements, even though his entire party had become easualties. He rendered first aid to the injured and evacuated them by using as stretcher bearers 10 German prisoners whom he had captured. Soon thereafter his company commander was wounded and while dressing his wound Private Morelock was very severely wounded in the bip, which forced his evacuation. His heroic action and devotion to duty were an inspiration to the entire regiment.

G. O. No. 118, W. D., 1918.

Private, Company M, 167th Infantry, 12d Division.

On the afternoon of Oct. 16, 1918, when the Cote-de-Chatillon had just been gained after bitter fighting and the summit of that strong bulwark in the Kriemhilde Stellung was being organized, Private Neibaur was sent out on patrol with his automatic rifle squad to enfilade enemy machine-gun nests. As he gained the ridge he set up his automatic rifle and was directly thereafter wounded in both legs by fire from a hostile machine gun on his flank. The advance wave of the enemy troops, counterattacking, had about gained the ridge, and although practically cut off and surrounded, the remainder of his detachment being killed or wounded, this gallant soldier kept his automatic rifle in operation to such effect that by his own efforts and by fire from the skirmish line of his company, at least 100 yards in his rear, the attack was checked. The enemy wave being balted and lying prone, four of the enemy attacked Private Neibaur at close quarters. Those he killed. He then moved alone among the enemy lying on the ground about him; in the midst of the fire from his own lines, and by coolness and gallantry captured 11 prisoners at the point of his pistol and, although painfully wounded, brought them back to our lines. The counterattack in full force was arrested to a large extent by the single efforts of this soldier, whose heroic exploits took place against the sky line in full view of his entire battalion. place against the sky line in full view of his entire battalion.

lying close to the enerny's lines and, under fire, carried him to a place of safety.

Private, Company I, 22d U. S. Infantry. Held a bridge against a superior force of the enemy and fought, though severely wounded, until the main body came up to cross.

First sergeant, Company A, 33d Illinois Infantry.
While the troops were falling back before a superior force, this soldier, assisted by 1 companion, and while under severe fire at close range, saved a cannon from capture by the encmy.

Lieutenant colonel, division machine-gun officer, 82d Division. Having gone forward to reconnoiter new machine-gun positions, Colonel Pike offered his assistance in reorganizing advance Infantry units which had become disorganized during a heavy artillery shelling. He succeeded in locating only about 20 men, but with these he advanced and when later joined by several Infantry platoons rendered inestimable service in establishing outposts, encouraging all by his cheeriness, in spite of the extreme danger of the situation. When a shell had wounded one of the men in the outpost, Colonel Pike immediately went to his aid and was severely wounded himself when another shell burst in the same place. While waiting to be brought to the rear, Colonel Pike continued in command, still retaining his jovial manner of encouragement, directing the reorganization until the position could be held. The entire operation was carried on under terrific bombardment, and the example of courage and devotion to duty, as set by Colonel Pike, established the highest standard of morale and confidence to all under his charge. The wounds he received were the cause of his death.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to daughter, Miss Martha Agnes Pike. offered his assistance in reorganizing advance Infantry units which had become Returning within 45 minutes, he remained on duty throughout the entire night, inspecting his lines and establishing outposts. Early the next morning he was again wounded, once again displaying his remarkable devotion to duty by remaining in command of his platoon. Later the same day a bursting shell added two more wounds, the same shell killing his commanding officer and two officers of his company. He then assumed command of the company and organized its position in the trenches. Displaying wonderful courage and tenacity at the critical times, he was the only officer of his battalion who advanced beyond the town, and by clearing machine-gun and sniping posts contributed largely to the aid of his battalion in holding their objective. His example of bravery and fortitude and his eagerness to continue with his mission despite severe wounds set before the enlisted men of his command a most wonderful standard of Brigadier general, U. S. Volunteers. Distinguished gallantry and good conduct in the defense.

Private, Company A, 4th Massachusetts Cavalry.

Volunteered as a member of a boat crew which went to the rescue of a large number of Union soldiers on board the stranded steamer Beston and with great gallantry assisted in conveying them to shore, being exposed during the entire time to a heavy fire from a Confederate battery.

First lieutenant, 306th Infantry, 77th Division.

In command of Company K, 306th Infantry, he led his men in an attack on St. Hubert's Pavillion through terrific enemy machine-gun, rifle, and artillery fire and drove the enemy from a strongly held intrenched position after hand-to-hand fighting. His bravery and contempt for danger inspired his men, enabling them to hold fast in the face of three determined enemy counter-attacks. His company's position being exposed to enemy fire from both flanks, he made three efforts to locate an enemy machine gun which had caused heavy casualties in his company. On his third reconnaissance he discovered the gun position and personally silenced the gun, killing or wornding the crew thereof. The third counterattack made by the enemy was initiated by the appearance of a small detachment advancing well in advance of the enemy attacking wave, calling as they advanced "Kamerad." When almost within reach of the American front line the enemy attacking wave behind them appeared, attacking vigorously with pistols, rifles, and hand grenades, causing heavy easnalties in the American platoon holding the advanced position. Lieutenant Schaffner mounted the parapet of the trench and used his pistol and grenades with great gallantry and effect, killing a number of enemy soldiers, finally reaching the enemy officer leading the stacking forces, a captain, shooting and mortally wounding the latter with his pistol, and dragging the captured officer back to the company's trench, securing from him valuable information as to the enemy's strength and position. The information so secured enabled Lieutenant Schaffner to maintain for five hours the advanced position of his company despite the fact that it was surrounded on three sides by strong enemy forces. The undaunted bravery, gallant soldierly conduct, and leadership displayed by Lieutenant Schaffner undoubtedly saved the survivors of the company from death or capture.

Private, Company C, 90th Pennsylvania Infantry. Voluntarily extinguished the burning fuse of a shell which had been thrown into the lines of the regiment by the enemy.

Private, Company D, 116th Illinois Infantry. Gallantry in the charge of the "volunteer storming party."

Lieutenant Colonel Smith personally led a party of 2 other officers and 10 soldiers, and went forward to reestablish runner posts and carry ammunition to the front line. The guide became confised and the party strayed to the left flank beyond the outposts of supporting troops, suddenly coming under fire from a group of enemy machine guns only 50 yards away. Shouting to the other members of his party to take cover, this officer, in disregard of his own danger, drew his pistol and opened fire on the German gun crew. About this time he fell, severely wounded in the side, but regaining his footing, he continued to fire on the enemy until most of the men in his party were out of danger. Refusing first-aid treatment he then made his way in plain view of the enemy to a hand-grenade dunip and returned under continued heavy of the enemy to a hand-grenade dump and returned under continued heavy machine-gun fire for the purpose of making another attack on the enemy emplacements. Sergeant, Company G, 1st Pennsylvania Rifles. Capture of flag of 15th Georgia Infantry (C. S. A.).

Surgeon, U. S. Volunteers. Voluntarily reconnoitered the enemy's position and carried orders under the hottest fire.

Sergeant, Company G, 1st U. S. Cavalry. Bravery in action with Indians.

Corporal, Company C, 1st Maryland Infantry.
As color bearer with most conspicuous gallantry preceded his regiment in the assault and planted his flag upon the enemy's works.

Major, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.

Counterattacked by two regiments of the enemy, Major Thompson encouraged his battalion in the front line by constantly braving the hazardous fire of machine guns and artillery. His courage was mainly responsible for the heavy repulse of the enemy. Later in the action, when the advance of his assaulting companies was held up by fire from a hostile machine-gun nest and all but one of the six assaulting tanks were disabled, Major Thompson, with treat gallantry and coolness rushed forward on foot three separate times in and but one of the six assuming tains were district, Major Thompson, with great gallantry and coolness, rushed forward on foot three separate times in advance of the assaulting line, under heavy machine-gun and antitank-gun fire, and led the one remaining tank to within a few yards of the enemy machine-gun nest, which succeeded in reducing it, thereby making it possible for the infantry to advance.

Sergeant, Company A, 37th Massachusetts Infantry.

At the risk of his own life, assisted in carrying to a place of safety a wounded and helpless officer.

Advanced with the pioneers, and, under heavy fire, assisted in removing two lines of chevaux-de-frise; was twice wounded but advanced to the third line, where he was again severely wounded, losing a leg.

Private, Company G, 8th U. S. Cavalry. Bravery in action with Indians.

Second lieutenant Company I, 122d New York Infantry.
Having been sent outside the lines to obtain certain information of great importance and having succeeded in his mission, was surprised upon his return by a large force of the enemy, regaining the Union lines only after greatly imperiling his life.

First sergeant, Company I, 7th U. S. Cavalry.

Killed a hostile Indian at close quarters, and, although entitled to retirement from service, remained to the close of the campaign.

Corporal, Company D, 1st Michigan Cavalry.
Having been surprised and captured by a detachment of guerrillas, this soldier, with other prisoners, seized the arms of the guard over them, killed two of the guerrillas, and enabled all the prisoners to escape.

Sergeant, Company I, 52d Ohio Infantry. Risked his life in saving a wounded comrade.

Major and aid-de-camp, U. S. Volunteers. Voluntarily rode between the lines while two brigades of Union troops were firing into each other and stopped the firing.

Private, Company B, 20th Kansas Volunteer Infantry.
Swam the Rio Grande de Pampanga in face of the enemy's fire and fastened a rope to the occupied trenehes, thereby enabling the crossing of the river and the driving of the enemy from his fortified position.

Private, Company G, 5th New York Cavalry. Voluntarily assisted in the burning and destruction of the bridge under heavy fire of the enemy.

Private, Company B, 8th Missouri Infantry. Gallantry in the charge of the "volunteer storming party."

Private, Company E, 12th Wisconsin Infantry. Although severely wounded in a charge, he remained with the regiment until again severely wounded, losing his leg.

Sergeant, Company F, 10th Connecticut Infantry. Gallantry as color bearer in the assault on Fort Gregg.

Corporal, Company G, 4th Maryland Infantry. Was one of the three soldiers most conspicuous in the final assault.

Corporal, Company F, 142d Infantry, 36th Division.

After his platoon had started the attack Corporal Turner assisted in organizing a platoon consisting of the battalion scouts, runners, and a detachment of Signal Corps. As second in command of this platoon he fearlessly led them forward through heavy enemy fire, continually encouraging the men. Later he encountered deadly machine-gun fire which reduced the strength of his command to but four men, and these were obliged to take shelter. The enemy machine-gun emplacement, 25 yards distant, kept up a continual fire from four machine-guns. After the fire had shifted momentarily Corporal Turner rushed forward with fixed bayonet and charged the position alone, capturing the strong point with a complement of 50 Germans and 4 machine guns. His remarkable display of courage and fearlessness was instrumental in destroying the strong point, the fire from which had blocked the advance of his company. of his company.

*TURNER, WILLIAM B. Near Ronssoy, France, Sept. 27, 1918. R—Garden City, N. Y. B—Boston, Mass. G. O. No. 81, W. D., 1919.

First lieutenant, 105th Infantry, 27th Division.

He led a small group of men to the attack, under terrific artillery and machinegun fire, after they had become separated from the rest of the company in the darkness. Single handed he rushed an enemy machine gun which had suddenly opened fire on his group and killed the crew with his pistol. He then pressed forward to another machine-gun post 25 yards away and had killed one gunner himself by the time the remainder of his detachment arrived and put the gun out of action. With the utmost bravery he continued to lead his men over three lines of hostile trenches, cleaning up each one as they advanced, regardless of the fact that he had been wounded three times, and killed several of the enemy in hand-to-hand encounters. After his pistol ammunition was exhausted, this gallant officer seized the rifle of a dead soldier. ammunition was exhausted, this gallant officer seized the rifle of a dead soldier. bayoneted several members of a machine-gun crew, and shot the other. Upon reaching the fourth-line trench, which was his objective, Lieutenant Turner captured it with the nine men remaining in his group and resisted a hostile counterattack until he was finally surrounded and killed.

Sergeant, Company M, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
While a member of the reconnaissance patrol, sent out at night to ascertain the condition of a damaged bridge, Sergeant Van Iersel volunteered to lead a party across the bridge in the face of heavy machine-gun and rifle fire from a range of only 75 yards. Crawling alone along the débris of the ruincd bridge he came upon a trap, which gave away and precipitated him into the water. In spite of the swift current he succeeded in swimming across the stream and found a lodging place among the timbers on the opposite bank. Disregarding the enemy fire, he made a careful investigation of the hostile position by which the bridge was defended and then returned to the other bank of the river, reporting this valuable information to the hattalion commander.

Private, Company G, 116th Ohio Infantry. In the assault on Fort Gregg this soldier climbed upon the parapet and fired down into the fort as fast as the loaded guns could be passed up to him by comrades.

First lieutenant, 4th U. S. Infantry.

With two comrades, took position in advance of the skirmish line, within short distance of the enemy's gunners, and drove them from their guns.

Chief bugler, 6th New York Cavalry. Capture of colors of 44th Georgia Infantry (C. S. A.).

Major, 1st Vermont Cavalry. Led the second battalion of his regiment in a daring charge.

Private, Company D, 54th Ohio Infantry. Gallantry in the charge of the "volunteer storming party."

Private, Company E, 4th Rhode Island Infantry.

Bore off the regimental colors after the color sergeant had been wounded and the color corporal bearing the colors killed, thereby saving the colors from capture.

Private, Company C, 17th U. S. Infantry.
Gallantly assisted in the rescue of the wounded from in front of the lines and under heavy fire from the enemy.

First sergeant, Company D, 363d Infantry, 91st Division. While making his way through a thick fog with his automatic rifle section, his advance was halted by direct and unusual machine-gun fire from two guns. Without aid, he at once dashed through the fire and, attacking the nest, killed two of the gunners, one of whom was an officer. This prompt and decisive hand-to-hand encounter on his part enabled his company to advance farther without the less of a man.

First lieutenant, 6th U. S. Cavalry.
Rallied his command and led it in the advance against the enemy's fortified position.

Sergeant, Company G, 52d New York Infantry. Capture of flag of 23d Virginia Infantry (C. S. A.) and its bearer.

Major, 4th Kentucky Cavalry.

This officer, with a small detachment, while en route to destroy steamboats loaded with supplies for the enemy, was stopped by an unfordable river, but with 5 of his men swam the river, captured two leaky canoes, and ferried his men across. He then encountered and defeated the enemy, and on reaching Wetumpka found the steamers anchored in midstream. By a ruse obtained possession of a boat, with which he reached the steamers and demanded and received their surrender.

Private, Company I., 4th U. S. Infantry. While carrying important orders on the battle field, was desperately wounded and, being unable to walk, crawled far enough to deliver his orders.

Lieutenant colonel, 8th Illinois Infantry. Led the right wing of his regiment and, springing through an embrasure, was the first to enter the enemy's works, against a strong fire of artillery and

First lieutenant, Company G, 4th Verment Infantry. Distinguished bravery in action where he was wounded and had a horse shot under him.

Private, Company A, 2d Maine Infantry. Voluntarily accompanied his commanding officer and assisted in removing the dead and wounded from the field under a heavy fire of artillery and musketry.

First lieutenant, Company D, 3d U. S. Reserve Missouri Infantry. Displayed conspicuous coolness and heroism in rallying troops that were recoiling under heavy fire.

Went to the front during a desperate contest and unaided carried to the rear several wounded and helpless soldiers.

Private, Company C, 5th U.S. Infantry, Gallantry in actions.

Private, Company G, 35th Massachusetts Infantry.
Was among the last to leave the field and was instrumental in saving the lives of several of his comrades at the imminent risk of his own.
Was foremost in line in the assault, where he lost a leg.

Private, Company F, 119th Illinois Infantry. Capture of flag.

Sergeant, Company B, 11th Michigan Infantry.

As the enemy were about to charge, this officer went outside the temporary Union works among the dead and wounded enemy and at great exposure to himself cut off and removed their cartridge boxes, bringing the same within the Union lines, the ammunition being used with good effect in again repulsing the attack.

First licutenant, 5th Battery, Maine Light Artillery.
While acting as assistant adjutant general, Artillery brigade, 6th Army Corps, went over the enemy's works, mounted, with the assaulting column, to gain quicker possession of the guns and to turn them upon the enemy.

Major, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

Although cut off for five days from the remainder of his division, Major Whittlesey maintained his position, which he had reached under orders received for an advance, and held his command, consisting originally of 463 officers and men of the 308th Infantry and of Company K of the 307th Infantry, together in the face of superior numbers of the enemy during the five days. Major Whittlesey and his command were thus cut off, and no rations or other supplies reached him, in spite of determined efforts which were made by his division. On the fourth day Major Whittlesey received from the enemy a written proposition to surrender, which he treated with contempt, although he was at that time out of rations and had suffered a loss of about 50 per cent in killed and wounded of his command and was surrounded by the enemy.

Second lieutenant, 353d Infantry, 89th Division.

Advancing with his platoon during the St. Mihiel offensive, he was severely wounded in four places by the bursting of a high-explosive shell. Before receiving any aid for himself he dressed the wounds of his orderly, who was wounded at the same time. He then ordered and accompanied the further advance of his platoon, although weakened by the loss of blood. His right hand and arm being disabled by wounds, he continued to fire his revolver with his left hand until, exhausted by loss of blood, he fell and died from his wounds before aid could be administered.

First lieutenant, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.

While he was leading his company against the enemy, his line came under heavy machine-gun fire, which threatened to hold up the advance. Followed by two soldiers at 25 yards, this officer went out ahead of his first line toward a machine-gun nest and worked his way around its flank, leaving the two soldiers in front. When be got within 10 yards of the gun it ceased firing, and four of the enemy appeared, three of whom were shot by Lieutenant Woodfill. The fourth, an officer, rushed at Lieutenant Woodfill, who attempted to club the officer with his rifle. After a hand-to-nand struggle, Lieutenant Woodfill killed the officer with his pistol. His company thereupon continued to advance, until shortly afterwards another machine-gun nest was encountered. Calling on his men to follow, Lieutenant Woodfill rushed ahead of his line in the face of heavy fire from the nest, and when several of the enemy appeared above the nest he shot them, capturing three other members of the crew and silencing the gun. A few minutes later this officer for the third time demonstrated conspicuous daring by charging another machine-gun position, killing five men in one machine-gun pit with his rifle. He then drew his revolver and started to jump into the pit, when two other gunners only a few yards away turned their gun on him. Failing to kill them with his revolver, he grabbed a pick lying near by and killed both of them. Inspired by the exceptional courage displayed by this officer, his men pressed on to their objective under severe shell and machine-gun fire.

R—Palatka, Fla. B—Shelby, N. C. G. O. No. 70, W. D., 1919. Sergeant, Company K, 148th Infantry, 37th Division.

He advanced alone through violent artillery fire to reconnoiter the new position to be occupied by his company beyond the l'Escaut River. He made the reconnaissance and returned with valuable information for his company commander, but was wounded while advancing to the new position with his company.

Sergeant, Company D, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.
Sergeant Aamot had sought cover in a shell hole, after a difficult advance in the face of heavy machine-gun fire, when he observed distress signals from a tank near by on which concentrated artillery and machine-gun fire was being directed by the enemy. Leaving his shelter, Sergeant Aamot proceeded through the fire to the tank, where he found a wounded man, whom he courageously carried to safety.

Private, Company G, 109th Infantry, 28th Division.
When his company was suddenly fired upon by enemy machine guns during an advance and forced to seck shelter Private Aaronson remained in the open under a continuous shower of machine-gun bullets, caring for eight wounded men, dressing their wounds and securing their evacuation.

Oak-leaf cluster.

For the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near Apremont, France, on the same date, Private Aaronson is awarded an oak-leaf cluster to be worn with the distinguished-service cross. Having become separated from his company and wounded by a bullet which pierced his helmet, he advanced alone on a machine-gun nest across an open field in broad daylight, killed the gunner and captured two of the crew, whom he pressed into tho

Sergeant, Company A, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
He saved the life of a soldier who was directly under the fire of an enemy machine gun by rushing the gun, killing the gunner, and capturing the gun. His gallant conduct inspired the men of his plateon to continue the advance.

Corporal, Company B, 3d Supply Train, 3d Division.
Wounded in the hand by a bursting shell, he voluntarily drove a motor cycle, carrying messages and information to and from French and other head-quarters. He was without sleep for 36 hours and constantly passed through hostile machine-gun and shell fire.

First licutenant, 324th Infantry, 81st Division. He voluntarily went through an intense machine-gun barrage at great personal risk in order to rescue a wounded soldier.

Corporal, Company M, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
When all the officers of his platoon had become casualties under a heavy artillery and machine-gun fire, Corporal Abend, displaying great bravery and initiative, voluntarily took command, effected a reorganization of the platoon which was being rapidly depleted, and held his men so well in hand that they completely repulsed two powerful counterattacks launched by the enemy.

Second lieutenant, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.
Commanding the regimental ploneer platoon, he led it and the Stokes mortar platoon as infantry, and overcame a machine-gun nest, capturing several machine guns and disposing of the crew. He continued to advance under heavy shell and machine-gun fire until he fell wounded in the head, hip, and leg.

Second lieutenant, 147th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Lieutenant Abernethy, while on patrol duty, attacked an enemy plane at close range, firing 100 rounds at a distance of from 50 to 200 yards. He followed the German ship down and saw it fall out of control, and as he turned he found five enemy planes diving at him. Without hesitation, he took the offensive and fired 200 rounds into enemy ships at not more than 15 to 20 yards. He observed tracer bullets entering the bodies of the enemy aircraft, but owing to the violence of the combat he did not have time to observe whether any of his force were shot down. Fighting vigorously, he succeeded in dispersing the enemy ships and making a safe landing within his own lines, although his own engine and plane were almost shot to pieces.

Private, Company K, 313th Infantry, 79th Division.
While carrying a message from battalion to regimental headquarters, Private Abrams was seriously injured in the lungs and eyes by concentrated mustard gas, but he continued on his mission and reported back to battalion headquarters before seeking medical attention.

Private, Company A, 2d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division.
When his gun squad had received orders to withdraw to a better position because of the intense fire to which they were subjected, the retreat was delayed because the gunner had been wounded. Private Achenbach rushed to the gun and endeavored to remove it, but while thus engaged he received severe wounds in the arms, legs, and stomach, which shortly after caused his death.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Miss Emile Achenbach.

Second lieutenant, 320th Machine Gun Battalion, 82d Division.
Seeing a flank position exposed by the nonarrival of an infantry regiment Lieutenant Acheson promptly moved his four guns to the position and held off a strong attack by the enemy. During the action 30 prisoners were taken, but nearly all his platoon had been killed or wounded. Lieutenant Acheson personally operated a gun, and, although wounded, poured a most effective fire in the ranks of the enemy, continuing until he died from loss of blood. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Rev. T. H. Acheson.

Second lieutenant, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
He assumed command of several detachments which were nearly surrounded by superior forces of the enemy, and with singular gallantry and leadership fought his way through the enemy lines back to our positions.

Corporal, Company D, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.

After his company had suffered severe losses from an enemy machine gun, Corporal Ackley volunteered to silence it single-handed. Advancing from the flank, under heavy sniping fire, he surprised the crew, killed the three gunners with his pistol, and then turned the machine gun on the enemy, covering the advance of his detachment to the position and inflicting severe losses on the hostile troops.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Rose Bailey.

Sergeant, Company L, 148th Infantry, 37th Division.
While leading his platoon he stormed and destroyed two machine-gun nests.
Later he again displayed utter disregard for his personal safety when he extricated his platoon from a perilous position, foreing a passage through the enemy and rejoining the remainder of the company.

Private, Company A, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
Even after he had been painfully wounded, Private Ackley remained on duty during the attack, performing his mission as runner until ordered to the dressing station by his commanding officer.

First lieutenant, 363d Infantry, 91st Division.
Exposing himself to heavy machine-gun and artillery fire in leading his platoon forward, Lieutenant Ackley himself captured a machine-gun nest, killing seven of the enemy with his automatic pistol.

Private, Company B, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.

Private Adair, accompanied by three other soldiers, volunteered and went out under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire to rescue a wounded comrade. Failing in the first attempt, they again tried, and this time succeeded in bringing the wounded man to shelter.

Sergeant, Company C, 315th Field Signal Battalion, 90th Division.

After being severely gassed, he stayed at his post and ran his telephone lines through a terrific artillery harrage. He remained on duty, though he was blinded and could hardly talk, until his organization was relieved.

After all the other runners in his company had become casualties, he carried numerous messages through heavy barrage and maintained communication with battalion headquarters at a critical moment in the operations.

Lieutenant colonel, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
He was conspicuous for gallantry in action when, with courage and forceinlness and without regard to his personal safety, he voluntarily organized detachments of units other than his own and led them into effective combat.

First lieutenant, 16th Infantry, 1st Division
During the violent righting of July 22, 1918, he distinguished himself by his courage, judgment, and efficient leadership. After the strength of the regiment had been seriously reduced by losses, he took command of a large number of the remaining troops, disposed them in effective positions, walking up and down the lines under constant fire from the enemy, and by his example of coolness and bravery inspired his men to hold the positions they had gained.

Sergeant, Company K, 353d Infantry, 89th Division. He followed a retreating German into a house in the town of Bouillonville and, ascertaining that the enemy had entered a dugout, fired the remaining two shots in his pistol through the door and ordered the surrender of the occu-pauts. By his bravery, coolness, and confidence he captured single handed approximately 300 prisoners, including 7 officers.

First lieutenant, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division, Voluntarily leading Iour soldiers through a heavy barrage, he attacked and killed a machine-gun crew which was enflading his company's first line. Ilis willingness, fearlessness, and great courage made possible the cleaning out of many more machine guns which were holding up the advance of his company.

Private, Company M, 310th Infantry, 78th Division.

Disregarding his own personal safety, he went to an open field, swept by heavy machine-gun fire, to the assistance of an officer who had been wounded during the withdrawal of his company from a raid. He bandaged the officer's wound and carried him to shelter, thereby saving the officer's life.

Captain, 30th Infantry, 3d Division. Captain, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.

Captain Adams was gassed to such an extent that he vomited several times in his gas mask and had to lie on top of his dugout under heavy shell fireto get sufficient air. He refused to leave his post for medical treatment and remained to direct the movements of his company during the entire day. He was killed in action July 25, 1918.

Posthnmously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Katherine R.

Second lieutenant, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.

He remained on duty after receiving two shrapnel wounds in the arm, and continued to lead platoon to its objective. He directed the consolidation of his position and the reorganization of his platoon before finally reporting to the aid station, eight hours after being wounded.

Corporal, Company C, 320th Machine Gun Battalion, 82d Division.
Facing intense machine-gun fire, he went forward with another soldier for 200 yards and rescued a wounded infantryman who had fallen when the patrol he was with had been forced back by hostile fire. Corporal Adams showed utter disregard for personal danger.

First lieutenant, 327th Infantry, 82d Division.
During an attack he led his company through a heavy artillery and machinegun fire. When he had advanced more than a kilometer in front of the other troops in the vieinity he found his flank exposed to terrifie fire, which made it necessary to draw back the right wing for connection with nearest division.

He recognized when dead good requiring and was at all times with He personally placed each group in position and was at all times exposed to sniper and machine-gun fire. Even after being seriously gassed he volunteered for duty in the front line.

First lieutenant, 140th Infantry, 35th Division.

After all the other officers of his company had become easualties, Lieutenant Adams reorganized his company and led it brilliantly in the assault on the town of Exermont. He was killed later during the consolidation of the new position. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Sallie C. Adams.

Corporal, Company C, 320th Infantry, 80th Division.
Rushing ahead of his advancing lines, exposed to heavy enemy fire, Corporal Adamski discovered a trail which was not being covered by enemy fire and through which men could pass in safety. He returned with this valuable information to his company commander, his action permitting his company to safely pass through the zone.

Sergeant, first class, Company C, 108th Engineers, 33d Division.

While a member of a working party engaged in building a bridge across the Meuse River, Sergeant Adelhelm, with another soldier, volunteered to cross the river in order to handle guy ropes, though there were two enemy machinegun nests on the opposite bank within 100 meters of the bridge site. Though his gas mask was rendered useless in crossing the river, he remained for more than two hours under a bombardment of gas and high-explosive shells and machine-gun fire until the work was completed.

Sergeant, Company C, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.

In charge of a reconnaissance patrol, he led his command far into enemy lines, until he encountered intense flanking machine-gun fire. Having guided his men to cover, he continued to advance alone until he discovered the source of the enemy fire, after which he returned to his men and started back to our lines. On the return journey he stopped and assisted a badly wounded man, picking him up and earrying him to safety, at the same time guiding his patrol in safety to the lines.

Second lieutenant, 39th Infantry, 4th Division.

Second neutenant, 39th inlantry, 4th Division.

Leading his platoon through an unusually heavy barrage, Lieutenant Adkisson filled a gap on his right flank which was until then exposed. From this point he attacked and captured several machine guns and 20 prisoners. During an attack he was badly gassed and his platoon reduced in strength to six men, but he held his position under a murderous cross fire of artillery and machine grown with solivered three dear letter. guns until relieved three days later.

Major, 306th Infantry, 77th Division.

Accompanied by another officer, Major Adler was supervising the work of clearing the enemy from St. Juvin when they suddenly came upon a party of the enemy numbering 150. Firing on the enemy with his pistol, Major Adler ran toward the party, calling on them to surrender. His bravery and good marksmanship resulted in the capture of 50 Germans, and the remainder fled.

Wagoner, Supply Company, 120th Field Artillery, 32d Division.

Through the operations near the Vesle River, covering a period of 12 days, he delivered hot meals to the firing battery at great personal risk, due to enemy shell fire. The battery position and all roads leading to them were subject to frequent enemy fire, but this soldier on every occasion delivered the meals to the battery without delay.

First sergeant, Company A, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
While commanding part of his company he was wounded in the head, but continued to direct his men, reorganizing a detachment of soldiers and establishing a line of defense in a trench. Later, while going to the assistance of some members of his command who had pushed far to the front, he was again hit in the shoulder and severely wounded. His heroic and voluntary disregard of self in order to save his comrades set a splendid example to all ranks.

He has since died of the wounds received in this action. He has since died of the wounds received in this action.

Captain, Machine Gun Company, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
While leading a platoon of heavy machine guns through a smoke sereen and under terrific fire, he suddenly became pocketed in the midst of enemy machine-gun strongholds. He personally went forward and, with the aid of bombs and the effective use of his pistol, made possible the holding of the position until a defense was organized.

Private, Company C, 107th Infantry, 27th Division. After being severely wounded by flying shrapnel, Private Affatato took shelter in a shell hole somewhat in advance of his company, from which he had become separated in the fog and smoke. He saved the lives of four of his wounded comrades who were occupying the shell hole by throwing live greades, which had been tossed into the shell hole by members of his own company in the rear, into the enemy's lines.

Private, first class, medical detachment, 146th Infantry, 37th Division. He voluntarily accompanied the first attack wave of the 146th Infantry, seeking out the wounded under terrific enemy machine-gun and artillery fire, carrying them to places of safety and applying first aid until he himself wasseriously wounded. This soldier's heroic conduct and devotion to his comrades greatly inspired the men of his regiment.

Corporal, Company C, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

After all of the officers and sergeants had become casualties, Corporal Ahearn took command of his company, leading it through the remainder of the day's action with great bravery and ability. Later in the day he went to the rescue of a wounded officer and succeeded in bringing him to a place of safety through terrific machine-gun fire.

Major, 348th Machine Gun Battalion, 91st Division.
Major Aird repeatedly reorganized the Infantry on the left flank of his division sector and by his sound tactics and good judgment kept the attack progressing against snipers, machine-gun nests, and artillery. He personally on several occasions went forward to reconnoiter and then led the attack against the disovered positions. He captured three enemy 77-millimeter guns, and by sighting through the bore turned their fire on hostile emplacements and machine-gun nests, destroying many such nests. His fearlessness, courage, and intitative were an inspiration and example to those under him, and to his efforts much of the splendid progress on this portion of the field was due.

Second lieutenant, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

During the advance in the Argonne Forest, France, Lieutenant Akers, having been severely wounded, led his platoon in a successful assault on two machinegun nests, thereby aiding in the advance of his battalion sergeant.

Corporal, Company A, 52d Infantry, 6th Division.

In repulsing a raid on our trenches, Corporal Akins seized an automatic rifle and pursued the Germans across No Man's Land in the face of converging fire of several enemy machine guns.

Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.
Although wounded by the explosion of his gun, Sergeant Albert remained on duty throughout the action in the Belleau Wood. Exposing himself to withering machine-gun fire, he carried a wounded comrade to a place of safety.

Sergeant, Company G, 5th Ammunition Train, 5th Division.

When an enemy shell struck some pyrotechnics stored in the ammunition dump of his organization, he directed and assisted in the removal of inflammable material and placing the fire under control. Through his coolness and courage the destruction of a large quantity of near-by ammunition was avoided.

Captain, 353d Infantry, 89th Division. When the battalion on the left of his own met with such heavy fire, as it was attempting to take up its position, that it was forced to withdraw, leaving many wounded men behind, Captain Albright, with fearless disregard for his own safety, went to the adjoining area, and, under continued heavy artillery fire, cared for all the wounded who had been left there.

First lieutenant, observer, 135th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
He, as an observer, with First Lieut. E. C. Landen, volunteered and went on an important mission for the corps commander without the usual protection.
Forced to fly at an altitude of 1,000 meters because of poor visibility, soon after crossing the lines they encountered an enemy Rumpler plane and forced it to the great of the protection of the it to the ground. On returning they attacked another Rumpler and drove it off. After completing their mission and seeing an enemy observation tower on Lake Lachaussee, they reentered enemy territory and fired upon it. Immediately attacked by seven enemy planes (Fokker type), a combat followed, in which Lieutenant Aldrich was mortally wounded.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Rev. Leonard Aldrich.

Private, first class, Company B, 311th Infantry, 78th Division. On the night of Sept. 24, 1918, Private Aldridge repeatedly carried messages between his company and battalion headquarters through a heavy barrage. He also took the place of a wounded litter bearer and assisted in bringing in wounded under shell fire.

First lieutenant, 355th Infantry, 89th Division.

After having been badly wounded early in the action, losing his right hand and being wounded in both legs and the chest, he returned to his platoon and addressed the men, telling them he was unable to go with them, but that he had confidence in their ability, to go ahead without him and urged them to sustain the high reputation of the platoon, company, and battalion, thereby inspiring his men with his own personal courage to advance.

Private, Company B, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
While a member of a patrol of three men on Apr. 21, 1918, he attacked a hostile patrol of seven men, and although fatally wounded continued in action until the hostile patrol was driven back and the officer commanding it, with a noncommissioned officer, was killed. Although mortally wounded he earried a

First lieutenant, 96th Aero Squadron, Air Service. While on a bombing expedition with other planes from his squadron he engaged in a running fight over hostile territory with a superior number of enemy battle planes from Friauville to Lamorville, France, he was seriously wounded in the abdomen by a machine-gun bullet, and his observer was shot through the legs. Although weak from pain and loss of blood, Lieutenant Alexander piloted his plane back to his own airdrome and concealed the fact of his injury until after his observer had been eared for.

Private, first class, Company B, 348th Machine Gun Battalion, 91st Division. Private Alexander repeatedly earried messages between his company and battalion posts of command through heavy enemy artillery and snipers' fire.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

Killed in action at Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he gave the supreme proof of that extraordinary heroism which will serve as an example to hitherto untried troops.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Mrs. Anna Dean.

Major general, 77th Division.

During the advance in the Argonne Forest, and at a time when his forces were fatigued by the stress of battle and a long period of active front-line service, Major General Alexander visited the units in the front line, cheering and encouraging them to greater efforts. Unmindful of the severe fire to which he was subjected, he continued until he had inspected each group, his utter disregard of danger and inspiring example resulting in the crossing of the Aire and the capture of Grand Pre and St. Juvin.

First lieutenant, pilot, 99th Aero Squadron, Air Service,
He, with Lieutenant Atwater, observer, on a photographic mission, was forced back by seven enemy pursuit planes. A few minutes later he returned over the lines and while deep in enemy territory was cut off by 12 enemy planes (Pfals scouts). He maneuvered his plane to give battle and so effectively managed the machine that he, with his observer, was able to destroy one and force the others to withdraw. With his observer severely wounded, he managed to bring his plane safely back to his own aerodrome with his mission completed. completed.

First lieutenant, 327th Infantry, 82d Division.
Leading the first attack wave, he was painfully wounded in the mouth. He continued on through the heavy fire for a distance of 10,000 yards until his objective was reached. Organizing his position and consolidating his men, he remained in command, though very weak from exhaustion and loss of blood, refusing treatment until relieved.

Captain, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.
Although painfully wounded by a machine-gun bullet on Oct. 4, 1918, Captain Alfonte refused to be evacuated and remained on duty in an exposed position on Hill 240 until his regiment was relieved.

Corporal, Company I, 116th Infantry, 29th Division. He displayed exceptional daring iu capturing single-handed 3 guns and 20 prisoners.

Corporal, Company B, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
During a heavy bombardment of the front line near Cantigny, France, May 22, 1918, although severely injured by the explosion of a shell which buried two comrades, he promptly and courageously dug them out with his hands and clock them to shelter, being subjected all the time to severe fire of shell and shrapnel.

Second licutenant, 137th Infantry, 35th Division.

Though suffering from the effects of gas, he refused to be evacuated, and upon his company commander being called upon to assume command of the battalion Licutenant Alien displayed marked bravery and skill in leading the advance of his company. Seriously wounded, he again refused to be evacuated, remaining on duty until his command was withdrawn.

Sergeant, Company E, 357th Infantry, 90th Division. During a fight between his company and a superior force of the enemy Sergeant Allen observed a machine gun in action on the flank of his platoon. He charged the emplacement and captured the crew of six men.

First lieutenant, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
Lieutenant Allen displayed exceptional courage, bravery, and self-sacrifice by moving about the woods in which his platoon was quartered during a heavy bombardment, placing his men in safe dugouts and rendering aid to wounded men under an intense shelling of high explosives and gas shells.
He was killed while in the execution of this mission.

Sergeant, Company B, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

During the attack and defense of Cantigny, Sergeant Allen established an automatic rifle post 75 yards in front of our lines and under heavy machinegun and shell fire of the enemy. He had previously rendered invaluable aid in fearlessly crawling from shell hole to shell hole to aid wounded comrades.

First lieutenant, Coast Artillery Corps, observer, 8th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

He, as an observer, with First Lieutenant Edward Russell Moore, pilot, took advantage of a short period of fair weather during generally unfavorable atmospheric conditions to undertake a photographic mission behind the German lines. Accompanied by two protecting planes, they had just commenced their mission when they were attacked by eight enemy planes, which followed them throughout their course, firing at the photographic plane. Lieutenant Moore, pilot, with both flying wires cut by bullets, a landing wire shot away, his elevators riddled with bullets, and both wings punctured, continued on the prescribed course, although it made him an easy target. Lieutenant Allen was thus enabled in the midst of the attack to take pictures of the exact territory assigned, and he made no attempt to protect the plane with his machine guns. Displaying entire disregard for personal danger and steadfast devotion to duty, these two officers successfully accomplished their mission. pheric conditions to undertake a photographic mission behind the German mission.

Lieutenant colonel, Chief Signal Officer, U. S. Volunteers. Colonel Allen, by his persistent and untiring efforts on an unarmed transport, the Adria, and under fire of the Spanish batteries, succeeded in raising and severing two submarine cables used by the enemy.

Corporal, Company B, 116th Infantry, 29th Division. Corporal Allen, in company with four other soldiers, attacked and captured eight machine guns, together with their crews, in the face of determined resist-

Corporal, Company K, 364th Infantry, 91st Division.
Responding to a call for volunteers, Corporal Allen, with five others, advanced 400 yards beyond their front to bring in wounded comrades. They succeeded in rescuing seven of their men and also in bringing in the dead body of a lieutenant while exposed to terrific machine-gun fire.

Captain, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
Captain Allen remained in command of his company after he had been wounded and, after the battalion commander had been wounded, took command of the battalion and led it forward under heavy fire from artillery and machine guns, taking and holding all objectives.

Private, Company F, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
Private Allen, together with four other men, charged a machine-gun nest containing three heavy machine guns, and captured the 3 guns and 20 prisoners.

Sergeant, Company M, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
On Oct. 12 he repeatedly exposed himself while aiding wounded comrades under terrific bombardment. On Oct. 15 he fearlessly entered the wood and drove back enemy detachments before they could place machine guns on the flank of his battalion.

Sergeant, Company C, 312th Machine Gun Battalion, 79th Division.

In the face of direct machine-gun fire not more than 40 yards distant, he mounted a machine gun and succeeded in knocking out one of the enemy guns and taking 25 prisoners. Although seriously wounded during this most gallant exploit, he remained at his gun and ably assisted the advancing Infantry until weakness and loss of blood forced him to go to the rear.

Corporal, Company A, 305th Engineers, 80th Division.
Corporal Allman and a comrade were severely wounded by the explosion of a shell. He administered first aid to his companion, himself refusing medical attention. He then carried the wounded man through the heavily shelled town to a dressing station. Although again wounded by machine-gun fire, he continued to assist the man, refusing medical attention until his comrade had been attended to.

First sergeant, Company G, 309th Infantry, 78th Division.
With another soldier, Sergeant Alt went to the rescue of an officer and several men of his company who had been severely wounded and were lying in some bushes more than 100 yards to the front. Crossing and recrossing, five times an open area which was under a heavy high-explosive shell fire and swept by machine-gun fire, he brought in the officer and wounded men of the party. The soldier who accompanied Sergeant Alt was instantly killed by machinegun fire in the attempt to effect the rescue.

Corporal, Company H, 38th Infantry, 3d Division. He remained at his post, bombing incoming German boats with hand grenades, although wounded during the battle.

Second lieutenant, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.

During the fighting at Meurcy Farm, near Villers-sur-Fere, France, July 27-28, 1918, his heroic leadership was an inspiration to his command. Lieutenant Amory took out a patrol of 64 men, penetrating the enemy lines for the purpose of reconnoitering terrain over which an advance was to be made on the following morning. When his patrol was fired on by machino guns from all sides, this officer led three of his men forward to clear the machine-gun nests, placing the rest of his men under cover. He succeeded in overcoming one of these nests and killing the crew, but as he was advancing on another gun, located in a house about 10 yards away, he was killed by a machine-gun bullet, his last words being, "We'll take that nest or die trying."

Posthumonsly awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Ruth Anderson.

First lieutenant, 363d Infantry, 91st Division. With the aid of an enlisted man, he attacked a nest of enemy snipers and succeeded in killing two, wounding one, and taking the remaining two as prisoners.

Private, Company B, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
He rendered service as stretcher bearer under heavy shell fire, continuing on duty for 48 hours, until complete exhaustion compelled him to be evacuated.

Mechanic, Company C, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Mechanic Anderson acted as company runner and carried numerous messages on rontes exposed to artillery and machine-gun fire. When on the point of collapse from exhaustion and ordered to the rear, he refused to leave his company. His individual efforts in maintaining communication regardless of the great dangers to which he was exposed were of great value to his company commander.

Second lieutenant, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

He fearlessly led his plattoon in the face of heavy machine-gun fire to a cave in which several hundred Germans had taken shelter. Rather than subject any of his men to such extreme danger, he entered the cave alone and demanded the surrender of the enemy and was killed as a result of this n addition to the distinguished-service cross, Lieutenant Colonel Arnold is awarded an oak-leaf cluster for the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near Thiaucourt, France, Sept. 12, 1918: At a critical moment in the advance he went through a barrage and stopped the assaulting lines of a neighboring unit which had failed to halt on their objective and were in danger from their own barrage. His coolness in walking up and down the line under heavy enemy hombardment inspired confidence and restored order in a wayoring line. order in a wavering line.

Corporal, Company G, 28th Infantry, 1st Division. Accompanied by another soldier, he attacked and destroyed an enemy machine-gun nest, using only his rifle and bayonet.

First lieutenant, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
With complete disregard for his own safety he left the shelter of a shallow trench and in full view of the enemy crossed a field swept by a hail of enemy machinegun and rifle fire to warn his company commander of a strong enemy force which threatened to isolate the companies holding the advanced position. Although warned by his company commander of his danger he calmly returned to his platoon's position under the hottest enemy fire. As he was about to enter a place of shelter he was killed by enemy fire.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Oscar M. Arnold.

Private, Company I, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

Private Arnold, while passing through an enemy machine-gun barrage, located an enemy machine-gun position. He single-handedly rushed the position, captured the gun, and forced the crew to surrender.

First lieutenant, 128th Infantry, 32d Division. He volunteered to lead and led a platoon of 41 men in an attack on Hill 269, Although all but four became casualties, this small group, under the leadership of Lieutenant Arpin, continued on its mission, took the bill, and held it for some time without hope of reinforcements.

First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 317th Infantry, 80th Division. He with his battalion aid unit accompanied his battalion into action in the Boisde-la-Cote, Lemont, and promptly opened his aid station within 100 yards of the front line, where he worked all night under continuous fire giving aid to the wounded. When there was a shortage of stretcher bearers he assisted in bringing in the wounded. Under intense fire he undertook to locate the ambulance dressing station and personally directed the evacuation of wounded to it. In the attack from the Bois-du-Fays, Oct. 5, he again went with the attacking troops and opened a first-aid station in an old cellar with no cover. Under an intense barrage of shrapnel and high-explosive shells he performed the most devoted service in attending the wounded, working continuously for nine hours until after his unit had been ordered to retire. for nine hours until after his unit had been ordered to retire.

Private, Company B, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.
When he declined to leave his platoon for treatment, though severely wounded in the leg by machine-gun fire, continuing with the advance of his platoon, he was again wounded and again refused to go to the rear but continued with the assaulting line until he received a third wound, which caused instantane-ous death. His high courage, unselfish devotion to duty, and utter disregard for his own safety raised the morale of his company to a high pitch and spurred them on to great endeavors.

Lieutenant Arthur, pilot, and Second Lieut. Howard T. Fleeson, observer, executed a difficult mission of Infantry contact patrol without protection of accompanying battle planes on the first day of the St. Mihiel offensive. After being driven back twice by a patrol of nine enemy planes, they courageously made a third attempt in the face of a third attack by the same planes, found the American lines, and after being shot down, but falling uninjured in friendly territory, communicated their valuable information to headquarters.

Oak-leaf cluster.

A bronze oak leaf is awarded Lieutenaut Arthur for the following acts of extraordinary heroism in action Oct. 18-30, 1918: On Oct. 18, 1918, while on Artillery reglage, he and his observer were attacked by four enemy planes. His observer's guns were jammed, but Lieutenant Arthur, with splendid courage and coolness, outmaneuvered the hostile aircraft and escaped, although they followed his plane to within 25 meters of the ground, hadly damaging it by machine-gun fire. On Oct. 30, 1918, his was one of a formation of nine planes which were to take photographs in German territory. Before the lines were reached six planes dropped out, but the remaining three entered the German lines, although they observed several large formations of enemy planes in the near vicinity. When they were 12 kilometers within the German lines, they were attacked by 18 enemy Fokkers. Regardless of his own safety, Lieutenant Arthur engaged these planes in order to allow his companions to escape, and turned toward his own lines only when he saw them shot down. Then he fought his way home, and in the fight which ensued his observer shot down two enemy planes. on Artillery reglage, he and his observer were attacked by four enemy planes. ensued his observer shot down two enemy planes.

He remained with the tank until a machine-gun nest was destroyed, and then accompanied the tank commander on foot through severe fire, killing two snipers with his pistoi, while the commander was disabling machine and antitank guns, after which he returned to his lines.

Major, 358th Infantry, 90th Division.

After being practically paralyzed for more than an hour from a wound in the neck, he resumed command of his battalion and continued to lead it with exceptional daring and effect until he was incapacitated by a second wound two days later.

Private, Company F., 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
Responding to a eall for volunteers, he proceeded 400 yards ahead of his platon to ascertain the location of the enemy. The mission was accomplished through an extremely heavy fire, but Private Ashcraft, after obtaining his information, successfully returned over the same ground, and made his report to the platoon commander.

Private, Company A, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.

During the attack of his company, though he had been severely wounded in his right arm, Private Atchavit shot and killed one of the enemy and captured another.

First lieutenant, 105th Infantry, 27th Division.

Continuing in action after being gassed, Lieutenant Atkins displayed exceptional personal bravery when the advance of his platoon was checked by heavy machine-gun fire in seizing the gun of a wounded soldier and attacking a machine gun, which he silenced and captured. Under the inspiration of this fearless act his company overcame several other machine-gun emplacements and reached the objective.

Captain, 353d Infantry, 89th Division. Private, Company B, 112th Engineers, 37th Division.

Private Atkinson, with two other soldiers, crossed the Scheldt River, after two attempts, and succeeded in stretching a line for a bridge across the stream. They were discovered and fired upon by the enemy, but they continued at work driving stakes, and made a second trip across the river to obtain wire, despite the fact that a violent artillery barrage had been laid down on their position.

Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.

During the attack on the Cote-de-Chatillon, Sergeant Atkinson, in command of the Stokes Mortar Plateon, together with three other soldiers, was advancing with the first wave of the assault, when, on nearing the objective, he discovered about 250 of the enemy forming for a counterattack. At this juncture he and his party advanced with a Stokes mortar, under heavy fire, to a position where he could got a fair field of fire, set up the mortar, and opened a murderous fire on the approaching enemy, dispersing them in every direction, His quick action, good judgment, and leadership undoubtedly not only broke up the enemy counterattack but inflicted severe losses on the enemy. He showed extraordinary heroism and courage at a critical time.

First lieutenant, observer, 99th Aero Squadron, Air Service. He started on a photographic mission with Lieutenant Alexander, pilot, over the enemy lines. Forced back by seven enemy pursuit planes, he determined to complete his mission and recrossed the line eight minutes later. A large group of enemy pursuit machines again attacked his plane. Disregarding his wound, he operated his machine gun with such effect that the nearest of the enemy planes was put down out of control.

Major, 316th Infantry, 79th Division.
The elements of the leading company of his battalion being stopped by terrific enemy machine-gun and artillery fire from the Bois-de-Beuge and the sunken Nantillois-Cunel Road and in danger of disorganization, Major Atwood then rushed personally into a position of the most extreme danger in the first wave, called to his men to follow, turned the retreat into an advance, and fell dead from a rifle wound in the face as he personally directed fire on an enemy machine-gun nest.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. M. Atwood.

Private, Company E, 314th Infantry, 79th Division.
While standing in the entrance of his dugout he saw a grenade, with fuse burning, rolling into the dugout where his comrades were sleeping. He picked up the grenade and attempted to throw it away, but it exploded in his hand, blowing off the hand and forearm.

Corporal, 20th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Killed in action at Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he gave the supreme proof of that extraordinary heroism which will serve as an example to hitherto untried troops.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John F. Auer.

Second lieutenant, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.

He collected several groups of disorganized men from different companies, organized a patrol, and, advancing across a creek, so deployed his men as to pour a cross fire on enemy machine-gun nests. Observing other nests then out of range, he led a volunteer squad and cleaned out 3 more machine-gun nests. He continued with the squad and put out of action three more nests.

First lieutenant, 130th Infantry, 33d Division.

On the evening of Oct. 5 a shell struck an old building in front of a dugout occupied by 1 of his machine-gun teams, wounding 2 of the men who were just coming out and hurling them to the bottom of the steps. Fire from the building spread to the framework of the dugout, which contained a quantity of grenades and high explosives. He unhesitatingly ran to the reseue of the 2 men and dragged them out, 1 at a time, but they died a short time later. He then entered the dugout, bringing out 5 unwounded men, undoubtedly saving their lives, for the dugout was totally destroyed a short time later. The entire exploit was earried on under sniping fire from across the river as well as machine-gun and artillery fire from three sides of the salient. well as machine-gun and artillery fire from three sides of the salient.

Private, Company F, 127th Infantry, 32d Division. He volunteered to go out in advance of our front lines and bring back wounded who had been left there when his company was withdrawn. He made 2 trips, under heavy fire, bringing back wounded with the aid of another soldier, but was killed by machine-gun fire when he went out for the third time.

He led a platoon of machine guns and two 1-pounder guns with their crews under cover of a fog within the enemy's wire and attacked at close range a strong point held by 25 men and 10 machine guns. After this position had been reduced, concentrated machine-gun fire from the ranks forced Lieutenant Austin and his party to withdraw. Exposing himself, in order to place his men under cover, he was mortally wounded, but he directed the dressing of the wounds of his men and their evacuation before he would accept any aid for himself. After a two-hour barrage, which caused many casualties in our forces, the enemy raided a sector occupied by our troops. During the attack lieutenant Avery exhibited unusual courage in holding together his handful of men, after one-third had become casualties, and distributing ammuntion to the remaining men, which finally stopped the attack. Two prisoners were taken during the battle. He was severely wounded about the head and later buried in a trench where he remained for three and one-half hours before being days out. dug out.

First lieutenant, 95th Aero Squadron, Air Service. While on his first patrol over the enemy's lines he attacked an enemy two-seater biplane. While thus occupied he was vigorously attacked by another enemy piplane. While this occupied ne was vigorously attacked by another enemy plane, but by a quick turn, skillful maneuvering, and accurate shooting he drove the second plane to the American side of the lines, where it crashed into the woods. Lieutenant Avery's motor had been badly damaged by bullets, but he made a successful landing back of our lines, where he learned that the enemy pilot who had been made a prisoner was a German acc credited with 16 victories. Lieutenant Avery's conduct was especially commendable because his plane had been seriously damaged at the beginning of the combat.

Private, Company B, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.

Private Awbrey, accompanied by three other soldiers, volunteered and went out under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire to rescue a wounded comrade. Failing in the first attempt, they again tried, and this time succeeded in bringing the wounded man to shelter.

Under the protection of three pursuit planes, each carrying a pilot and an observer, Lieutenants Bernheimer and Jordan, in charge of a photo plane, carried out successfully a hazardous photographic mission over the enemy's lines to the River Aisne. The four American ships were attacked by 12 enemy battle planes. Lieutenant Bernheimer, by coolly and skillfully maneuvering his ship, and Lieutenant Jordan, by accurate operation of his machine gun, in spite of wounds in the shoulder and leg, aided materially in the victory which came to the American ships, and returned safely with 36 valuable photographs. The pursuit plane operated by Lieutenants Hitchcock and Burns was disabled while these two officers were fighting effectively. Lieutenant Burns was mortally wounded and his body jammed the controls. After a headlong fall of 2,500 meters, Lieutenant Hitchcock succeeded in regaining control of this plane and piloted it back to his airdrome. Corporal, Company A, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
While acting as liaison corporal near Soissons, France, July 19, 1918, he was severely wounded, but nevertheless continued in action and killed three of the enemy before being ordered to a dressing station for treatment.

Second lieutenant, 354th Infantry, 89th Division.
Calling on his platoon to follow, he pushed forward and attacked enemy machine-gun nests. After killing two of the enemy he himself was killed by a hand grenade while accepting the surrender of another of the enemy.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Francis Bair.

First lieutenant, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.

During the period Oct. 9-15, 1918, he made frequent trips through heavy shell, gas, and machine-gun fire to repair broken telephone and telegraph wires, and when they could not longer be repaired he personally carried messages through the shell-swept area. On Oct. 15 he personally reconnoitered the Bois-de-la-Puttiere under heavy machine-gun and shell fire in an endeavor to find a suitable location for his regimental post of command.

Private, first class, Company M, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
While acting as platoon runner, he passed through three violent artillery barrages with coolness and apparent contempt for danger and repeatedly carried ammunition to his comrades under fire.

Scrgeant, first class, Company F, 7th Engineers, 5th Division. On Oct. 18 Sergeant Baker, with a detail of 19 men, carrying wire for wiring in outposts, followed the Infantry through the Bois-des-Rappes, where he employed his men as Infantry to assist in holding the captured position. they wired in four outposts in direct view of and under heavy fire from the enemy. On Nov. 3 and 4 they succeeded several times in laying footbridges across the Meuse under heavy fire, allowing the Infantry to cross to the east Private, 67th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. When his platoon was suffering easualties from the fire from a hidden machine gun, Private Baker exposed himself to heavy fire to take up a position on the flank of the enemy gun. He attacked and killed the gunner by rifle fire and then rushed the gun, killing the crew with his bayonet.

Sergeant, Company C, 105th Field Signal Battalion, 30th Division.

During the fighting around Mazinghein, Sergeant Baker, while attached to the 120th Infantry, was painfully wounded by shrapnel, which necessitated his going to the first-aid station for treatment. Realizing that his services were greatly needed at the line, he refused to be evacuated, but remained in action until the troops were withdrawn.

Pharmacist's mate, first class, U. S. Navy, attached to 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

During the attack in the Bois de Belleau he displayed conspicuous coolness under shell fire in evacuating wounded men. During the action near Vierzy he worked unceasingly for 16 hours giving assistance to the wounded on a field torn by high-explosive shells and covered by direct machine-gun fire. Near St. Etienne-a-Arnes he again gave proof of excellent judgment and courage in establishing an advance dressing station under violent shell and machine-gun fire, thereby saving many lives which would otherwise have Corporal, 15th Company, 6th Machine Gun Battalion, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

The maneuvered his machine gun squad independently of the platoon, going forward under intense enemy machine-gun and artillery fire and concentrations of gas. On one occasion he led his squad, regardless of personal danger, in the rear of the German positions and laid down a flanking fire against a portion of the enemy line, facilitating its capture, together with a number of the enemy.

Private, 148th Ambulance Company, 112th Sanitary Train, 37th Division. With two other soldiers he volunteered to rescue two wounded men who had been lying in an exposed position on the opposite bank of the Scheldt River for two days. Making two trips across the stream in the face of heavy machine-gun and shell fire, he and his companions succeeded in carrying both the wounded men to shelter.

Corporal, Company A, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.

Corporal Baldridge voluntarily led four men a distance of about 400 yards in advance of our line and attacked a superior force of the enemy who were attempting to man a machine guu in a disabled French tank. Due to his bold attack, the enemy was driven off and the tank retaken. His company was thereby erabled to continue the advance with slight loss.

Major, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.

He personally led his small detachment through woods that were infested with machine-gun nests and attained his objective on the northern edge of the Bois-des-Rappes and held same regardless of the danger due to his position in advance of the line and being enveloped by the enemy on both flanks. In utter disregard of his own life, he personally charged a machine-gun nest and killed the gunner.

Corporal, Company G, 167th Infantry, 42nd Division. In an attack on the Cote-de-Chatilion, disregarding all personal danger, he repeatedly went over shell-swept areas under heavy machine-gun fire to give first-aid treatment to the wounded and carry them to shelter.

Private, first class, Company K, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.

After all the other runners of his platoon had been either killed or wounded by machine-gun and shell fire and be himself had been seriously wounded, he refused evacuation, continuing with his mission. Private, Company B, 3d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division. On July 18, 1918, near Berzy-le-Sec, France, he was severely wounded by a shell, but as soon as he regained consciousness he went forward, rejoined former position in squad, and fought with it until ordered to an aid station by his platoon commander.

Sergeant, Company L, 370th Infantry, 93d Division.

After starting on a mission to reconnoiter the front lines of the enemy he received wounds which proved serious. Disregarding advice to return, he continued, collecting valuable information, which was submitted to his company commander through a member of his patrol party.

Private, Machine Gun Company, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
After repeatedly carrying messages under heavy fire, he was painfully wounded while acting as a connecting file, but he continued on duty until he was ordered to the dressing station. He then insisted on being permitted to rejoin his company rather than be sent to the hospital.

First lieutenant, 148th Infantry, 37th Division.
Having become separated from his battalion headquarters, Lieutenant Barnett, battalion adjutant, on his own initiative undertook, under heavy artillery and machine gun fire, to locate machine-gun nests which were hindering the advance. He ignored the warnings of his orderly as to the danger of this work and continued at it until he was killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Leland M. Barnett.

Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d

He left his trench several times and helped to carry wounded soldiers from the field through machine gun and artillery fire.

Sergeant, Company I, 320th Infantry, 80th Division.

Accompanied by an officer, Sergeant Barnhart advanced against an enemy machine-gun nest which was holding up the advance of his company. When they had reached a point within 50 yards of the gun they were fired upon, and the officer was severely wounded. Sergeant Barnhart immediately picked the officer up and brought him through a hail of machine-gun bullets to a position

Second lieutenant, 26th Infantry, 1st Division. He distinguished himself by heroic and inspiring leadership at Soissons, France, July 18, 1918, directing his platoon with unusual effectiveness until he fell wounded.

Sergeant, Battery D, 76th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
While in command of a "roving" gun section, Sergeant Barr took up a position about 500 yards in rear of the front line and executed a fire mission while exposed to heavy enemy bombardment. Although wounded, he refused to go to the rear until his mission was completed and the gun returned to the battery.

Second lieutenant, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.

Reorganizing his company after the other officers had become casualties, Lieutenant Barrett led them in an attack, capturing a machine-gun nest, capturing or killing the crew. Under heavy fire, he rescued two of his men who had been wounded and buried by a high-explosive shell. He was wounded while administering first aid to one of his men under machine-gun fire.

Private, 16th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division After making several successful journeys over an area swept by artillery, machine gun, and rifle fire in his capacity as runner, he was caught in a heavy barrage and seriously wounded. By a superhuman effort he made his way to his objective, and after being dragged into safety insisted on personally delivering his message. If then fell exhausted from loss of blood.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Della Wires.

First lieutenant, 149th Machine Gun Battalion, 42d Division.
Displaying the greatest courage and disregard of personal danger, at all times throughout the critical period of 4s hours, July 30-31, 1918, near Sergy, he particularly distinguished himself when leading his platoon into position in the face of fire on the crest of Hill 212 and when presiding over the reorganization of the residue there are the reorganization of the residue that the reorganization of the residue of the residue that the reorganization of the reorg ization of the position thus won.

enemy's fire. Oak-leaf cluster

For the following act of extraordinary heroism in action in the Bois-de-Belleau, France, June 11, 1918, Private Barrows was awarded an oak-leaf cluster: After the remainder of their group had become casualties from machine-gun fire, Private Barrows and a comrade displayed exceptional courage in charging and killing the crew of the hostile machine gun which had held up the advance.

Private, Company D, 8th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.

On duty as a runner at battalion headquarters Private Barrows was sent with a message to his company commander during a terrific enemy bombardment. Passing for 2½ kilometers over ground where gas and high-explosive shells were constantly falling, he was forced to tear off his gas mask in order to find his way, but he succeeded in delivering his message, falling exhausted just as his mission was completed.

Corporal, Company K, 354th Infantry, 89th Division.

After receiving a dangerous wound in the chest from a shell fragment, Corporal Barry insisted on going forward with his combat group. He pushed forward through intense machine-gun fire until again hit by a machine-gun bullet, which caused his death.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, J. T. Barry.

Private, Company I, 311th Infantry, 78thDivision.

Acting as stretcher bearer, under heavy machine-gun fire, he was wounded, but, disregarding his own injuries, he went to the aid of another wounded man, and while attending him was killed by shrapnel.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Cora Barry.

Private, Company D, 359th Infantry, 90th Division.
Private Barry, while carrying a message through a heavy barrage, was knocked down by shell explosions several times, but with heroic devotion to duty he continued on and delivered his message. On the return trip he was rendered unconscious for three hours by a shell. Upon being revived he immediately reported to battalion headquarters for duty.

Sergeant, Company H, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

After his platoon had been halted by the fire from a concealed machine-gun nest, Sergeant Barry, alone, exposed to heavy enemy fire, advanced and attacked the enemy position. He, single handed, put the machine-gun nest out of action and thus enabled his platoon to continue the advance.

Second lieutenant, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

Assuming command of his company after his company commander and a major portion of the company became casualties, he reorganized his company and personally led it forward in the attack, successfully attaining his objective in the face of intense machine-gun and artillery fire. He constantly exposed himself to enemy fire in order to encourage and insure the protection of his men.

Corporal, Company F, 130th Infantry, 33d Division.
While maintaining liaison with an adjacent company during a raid, Corporal Bartels personally cleared out two dugouts, taking a number of prisoners.
He was later wounded, but continued in action until he fell.

Corporal, Company C, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.

Corporal Barth with an officer penetrated about 3 kilometers into the enemy lines. Due to the fearlessness of Corporal Barth, the patrol evaded the chalenge of an enemy sentry and returned to our lines with valuable information. Previously, on Sept. 2, 1918, near Bazoches, Corporal Barth swam the Vesle and fixed a rope for the crossing of a partol. The patrol penetrated the enemy position and reconnoitered same, during which time Corporal Barth was wounded while going, under enemy fire, to the assistance of a wounded comrade whom he helped to our lines after obtaining special information of the enemy. The return of the patrol was made possible only by the heroic efforts of Corporal Barth. of Corporal Barth.

First lieutenant, pilot, 103d Aero Squadron, Air Service.
On Oct. 20, in the region of Ancerville, Lieutenant Bartholf, with one other pilot, engaged five enemy planes. Outnumbered, he did not hesitate to attack, and, although subjected to the severe fire of five enemy planes, he succeeded in destroying one. On Nov. 4, in the region of Baalon, while on a bombing expedition, he encountered an enemy patrol of eight machines (Fokker type). He immediately dived into their formation and, despite the severe fire to which he was subjected, continued a spirited combat with one of the enemy until it crashed to the ground.

Private, Company C, 2d Engineers, 2d Division. Crawling forward under heavy machine-gun fire, he assisted in bringing a wounded comrade to safety.

Private, first class, Company I, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.

Acting in the capacity of battalion runner, Private Bartlett volunteered and carried an important attack order from his regimental headquarters to the front-line battalion through a terrific artillery bombardment. He was twice knocked down while in the performance of this mission, but successfully delivered his message on time. Although in a dazed condition upon reaching the forward line, he again volunteered to carry a message across an area expect the approximation. swept by enemy machine-gun fire.

Secretary, Y. M. C. A., acting assistant chaplain, 18th Intantry, 1st Division. Voluntarily assuming the duties of chaplain, 18th Infantry, he displayed conspicuous bravery in caring for the wounded and burying the dead of his regiment under intense enemy fire, working constantly with the advanced elements of the command until July 22, 1918, when he was seriously wounded while in close proximity to the front line. His cheerful, heroic energy and indifference to personal danger exerted a profound effect upon the morale of the nen of his regiment and inspired them to many deeds of gallantry and supreme devotion to duty.

Corporal, Company D, 4th Engineers, 4th Division. He voluntered to go into Ville-Savoye at a time when it was under a heavy bombardment to rescue a wounded officer. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Alexander Barto.

Sergeant, Company L, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.
Wounded in the leg by a machine-gun bullet, he dressed his wound and continued to lead his section in a successful attack on two machine-gun nests.
He remained on duty for 14 hours, until weakness forced him to be evacuated.

Corporal, Battery A, 6th Field Artillery, 1st Division.
Being in charge of one of the sections of drivers of his platoon when it was caught in an enemy barrage, Corporal Barton unlimbered his gun and caisson, removed his horses and drivers to a place of safety, and returning to his platoon acted as runner, passing four times over heavily shelled areas.

Second lieutenant, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
After his superior officer had been wounded, he assumed command of and personally led the advance of his unit until he was struck by an enemy shell and severely wounded. Although suffering intense pain and almost unconscious, he refused to be evacuated until after he had given instructions to the platoon sergeant to continue the advance. His gallant conduct was an inspiring example to the men of his platoon.

Captain, 142d Infantry, 36th Division.
Captain Barton advanced his company against a strongly fortified enemy position, and succeeded in capturing the enemy works, together with 20 machine guns and 90 prisoners. After he had lost all his company officers and sustained many casualties in his command, Captain Barton again moved forward through an intense barrage and established the most advanced positions of the first had the battle. tion of the first day of the battle.

Private, Company E, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.

During an enemy raid on a platoon sector Private Baseom, although wounded three times by shell fragments, carried a message through artillery barrages to the company headquarters and returned with reinforcements. He did not accept first aid until after the raid had been repulsed.

First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 372d Infantry, 93d Division. During the attack on Monthois he administered first aid in the open under prolonged and intense shell fire until he was severely wounded and carried from the field. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Maude L. Bass.

Corporal, Company D, 358th Infantry, 90th Division. Corporal, Company D, 3881 Infantry, 90th Division.

Corporal Bassett volunteered to rush an enemy machine gun which had concentrated its fire on an opening in some harbed-wire entanglement through which his company was endeavoring to advance. He gallantly attacked the pill box and temporarily silenced one of the fire openings when he was mortally wounded.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Clarence W. Bassett.

Corporal, Company L, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
He volunteered to carry messages through intense shell and machine-gun fire after all of the runners had been killed or wounded. He was wounded while carrying a message, but continued on in spite of his injuries until it was delivered, and refused to go to the rear for treatment until ordered to do so by his company commander.

Private, Company I, 59th Infantry, 4th Division.
Showing marked personal courage, he repeatedly crossed ground swept by heavy artillery and machine-gun fire to deliver important messages. He volunteered for dangerous missions, his example being an inspiration to other runners.

Private, Company A, 325th Infantry, 82d Division.
When many squads of his company had broken up and the men scattered, Private Bassman with great courage collected 15 men who had become separated from their squads and organized them into a provisional platoon, which he successfully led in the attack, thereby contributing materially to the success of his company.

First lieutenant, 5th Regiment, United States Marine Corps, 2d Division. Although shot in both legs while leading his platoon through the woods at Hill 142, near Chateau-Thierry, France, on June 6, 1918, he refused treatment until after he had personally assured himself that every man in his platoon was under cover and in good firing position.

First lieutenant, 30th Infantry, 3d Division. When it seemed impossible for a runner to get through the violent barrage, he volunteered and carried an important message to regimental headquarters, returning with an answer.

Pharmacist's mate, third class, U. S. Navy, attached to 6th Machine Gun Battalion, United States Marine Corps, 2d Division. Rendering first aid under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire, he showed utter disregard for his own personal safety, venturing through shelled areas to the assistance of the wounded. He obtained most valuable information for the guidance of stretcher bearers.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.

After passing through a heavily bombarded area, he learned that a soldier of his platoon had been wounded and had fallen in the shelled area. He at once volunteered and went back for him, assisted in bringing him to a place of safety, and later helped to carry him through another shelled area to the first-aid station.

First lieutenant, 114th Infantry, 29th Division. After all the battalion runners had become casualtics, he volunteered and carried important messages to the rear through violent artillery and machine-gun fire. Next day this officer went through a wood occupied by enemy machine-gun nests and snipers and established liaison with three companies in an advanced position.

First lieutenant, Medical Corps, 139th Ambulance Company, 110th Sanitary Train, 35th Division.

When the sanitary detachment with which he was working was ordered to fall the he santary detachment with which he was working was ordered to tail back under intense artillery and machine-gun fire, Lieutenatt Bates, upon his own volition and contrary to the advice of others, refused to leave the wounded men who had not been evacuated, but remained with them throughout the day, ministering to them under the most violent fire, in utter disregard for his own safety. When night came he secured litter bearers and succeeded in taking all the wounded to safety.

Second lieutenant, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.

He displayed the highest quality of courage and leadership in leading his platoon through to its objective under a heavy barrage of machine-gun and artillery fire, without flank support. He held his objective under murderous artillery and machine-gun fire until relieved.

Private, Company F, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.

During a terrific bombardment on the morning of July 15 Private Bates carried in and dressed the wounded at great personal risk to himself. On Oct. 10, near Cuncl, although fatally wounded, he continued to command his men in attack on machine guns until the end.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Mrs. Vida Viola Snell.

Private, Company C, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

Private Batley, after two patrols had failed, volunteered and went alone to the grouped combat through the barrage and brought back information of the highest value.

Corporal, Company A, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
With absolute disregard for his personal safety, he went 300 yards beyond the front line, in full view of the enemy and under heavy machine-gun fire, and brought back a wounded soldier.

By bravely taking an exposed position at great risk to himself, he successfully maneuvered his command across a railroad track which was enfiladed by machine-gun and sniper fire. While doing so he was wounded in the neck, yet he fearlessly led his troops in a successful assault. His exceptional courage and initiative inspired his men to a victorious attack.

Private, first class, Company A, 102d Machine Gun Battalion, 26th Division. While the squad to which he belonged was proceeding to its objective, all the other members were either killed or wounded. After procuring assistance for the wounded soldiers, he immediately attached himself to another squad of his section and remained on duty with it throughout the day.

Second lieutenant, observer, 1st Aero Squadron, Air Service. Lieutenant Baucom, with First Lieut. William P. Erwin, pilot, by a long period deutenant Baucom, with First Lieut. William P. Erwin, pilot, by a long period of faithful and heroic operations, set an inspiring example of courage and devotion to duty to his entire squadron. Thronghout the Chateau-Thierry actions in June and July, 1918, he flew under the worst weather conditions and successfully carried out his missions in the face of heavy odds. In the St. Mihiel sector, Sept. 12-16, 1918, he repeated his previous courageous work. He flew as low as 50 feet from the ground behind the enemy's lines, barassing German troops with machine guns and rifles. He twice drove off enemy planes which were attempting to destroy an American observation balloon. On Sept. 12-13, 1918, he flew at extremely low altitudes and carried out infanty centuct, natios successfully. Again on Sept. 12 he attacked out infantry contact patrols successfully. Again on Sept. 12 he attacked a German battery, forced the crew to abandon it, shot off his horse a German officer who was trying to escape, drove the canoneers to their dugouts, and kept them there until the Infantry could come up and capture them. Oak-leaf cluster.

Oak-leaf cluster.

For the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near Sedan, France, Nov. 5, 1918, Lieutenant Baucom is awarded an oak-leaf cluster to be worn with the distinguished-service cross awarded him Oct. 1, 1918. With atmospheric conditions such that flying was nearly impossible he voluntarily undertook a flight as observer to locate the position of enemy troops and machine-gun nests which had been holding up our advance and causing severe casualties. Forced to fly at a very low altitude and subject to almost constant antiaireraft and rifle fire, he obtained the information that was vital to the success of our operations and dropped the message at division headquarters. He then penetrated far into the enemy lines and opening fire upon enemy crews routed them from a series of machine-gun nests. When his machine was finally shot down, he succeeded in operating the gun When his machine was finally shot down, he succeeded in operating the gun and beat off an attack by the enemy in force. Armed only with revolvers and German grenades which they found in an enemy emplacement, he and his observer then worked their way back to the American lines with valuable information, repeatedly subjected to enemy fire on their way.

Private, Company B, 310th Machine Gun Battalion, 79th Division. With two other soldiers, he voluntarily left a place of safety, went forward 40 neters under machine-gun fire in plain view of the enemy, and rescued another soldier who had been blinded by a machine-gun bullet, and was helplessly staggering about.

Sergeant, Company G, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

During offensive operations he carried important messages across fire-swept territory, continuing with this work until seriously wounded. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Martha F. Guy.

Pharmacist's mate, first class, U. S. Navy, attached to 1st Battalion, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Pharmacist's Mate Baume gave aid to the wounded under shell and machine-gun fire and went forward several times during the advance to locate advanced dressing stations.

Captain, 353d Infantry, 89th Division.
When his company was held up by machine-gun nests on three separate occasions Captain Baxter moved forward to a position in advance of his leading elements and, with rifle grenades, put the machine-gun nests out of action. On each of these occasions it was Captain Baxter's act that enabled his company to continue its advance. Throughout the attack his leadership and initiative were largely responsible for the success of his company.

Private, first class, Company C, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
Private Baxter was a scout for a Lewis gun squad during the attack. After all members of his squad, except the corporal, had been killed he ran 30 yards, picked up the Lewis gun, and opened fire on a group of 20 of the enemy who were attempting to turn the flank of platoon. He was exposed to heavy machine-gun fire, but his own fire was so effective that his unit was able to continue the advance.

Second lieutenant, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.

On June 5 Lieutenant Baxter led a patrol across a heavily shelled area and established liaison with an adjoining battalion. On July 21, while his platoon was being held up by terrific machine-gun fire, he crawled forward to dress the wounds of his men, and he so encouraged and rallied his men that further advance was made possible. On Oct. 4, though suffering from wounds, he advanced with his company in the face of most destructive fire of machine grant and artillar will further advances were investible. guns and artillery until further advance was impossible.

Private, medical detachment, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
On Sept. 8 Private Baxter went to the aid of wounded comrades, despite the deadly fire of rifles and machine guns, and after administering to them in a shell hole he carried the men one at a time to safety. On Sept. 28, after being painfully wounded, he refused to go to the rear until he had rendered first aid to a more seriously wounded comrade.

Corporal, Company C, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.

He went out 50 yards in front of the line under heavy machine-gun fire and brought back a wounded soldier. Later he carried a message 200 yards through a heavy barrage to battalion headquarters. He also volunteered to bring up ammunition under heavy fire and was wounded while performing that wiscin. that mission.

Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 353d Infantry, 89th Division. When the advance was checked by severe machine-gun fire, Sergeant Bayly, who was in charge of a 1-pounder section, volunteered to open fire on the nest with a Stokes mortar. Holding the mortar between his legs he put it in action immediately and silenced the machine-gun nest, allowing the advance to continue. He was killed by shellfire several days later. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Allyn R. Bayly.

Sergeant, first class, Company C, 4th Engineers, 4th Division.
Being a member of a covering detachment sent out to protect a detail which was constructing a bridge over the Vesle River, be voluntarily left his squad and fought his way alone down the river in order to locate an enemy machine-gun nought his way atone down the river in order to locate an enemy machine-gun nest. The flashes from his automatic rifle drew fire from the enemy, and ho was forced to jump into the river for protection. Swimming back to his squad, he organized a detail and led it in a successful attack on the hostile position. Two nights later, after the bridge had been destroyed, this soldier, with three others, volunteered to rebuild it. Under continuous fire from the enemy, he swam the river several times and set the posts for the bridge, thereby making possible the infantry attack on the following morning.

Corporal, Battery A, 13th Field Artillery, 4th Division.
Corporal Beal displayed unusual courage in repairing shattered telephone lines during a heavy barrage under direct observation by the enemy. He was repeatedly knocked down by concussion of shells and he was painfully wounded in the shoulder by a bursting shell, but he continued at his work until it was completed without seeking medical aid.

Sergeant, Company A, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

His company having been stopped by heavy enemy machine-gun fire, Sergeant Bean and two other soldiers worked their way into the enemy position, putting out of action two hostile machine guns. They then proceeded toward a dugout near by under heavy fire and, upon encountering a German in the act of throwing a grenade at them, Sergeant Bean shot him. Reaching the entrance to the dugout they forced the surrender of the occupants, who numbered 35, including 3 officers.

Sergeant, Company G, 7th Infantry, 3d Division. Sergeant, Company G, the mantry, 3d Division.

Though he had been so severely gassed as to be incapacitated for duty, and was also suffering from a painful rupture, Sergeant Bean remained in command of his plateon, which had been reduced to two squads, and led it under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire in an attack on an enemy machine-gun position, killing the gunners and capturing the gun. With conspicuous bravery he directed the consolidation of the position in the captured trench under continuous machine-gun and artillery barrage.

First lieutenant, 22d Aero Squadron, Air Service. When Lieutenant Beane's patrol was attacked by eight enemy planes (type Fokker) he dived into their midst in order to divert their attention from the other machines of his group and shot down one of the Fokkers in flames. Four other Fokkers then joined in the battle, one of which was also destroyed by this officer.

First lieutenant, 101st Engineers, 26th Division.

On Mar. 17, 1918, at the front near Chavignon, France, he was knocked down by a shell explosion, which caused him to lose consciousness. Upon regaining consciousness he searched for and found some of his men. During two hours he assisted Sergeant Reed and Corporal Belanger, of his detachment, back to the trenches, part of the time under fire of a German aviator and of German artillery. His energy, salf-sacrifice, and spirit throughout the operation were of the birthest order. artillery. His energ of the highest order.

Private, first class, Company M, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
After his platoon was practically wiped out and had been withdrawn near Chateau-Thierry, France, on June 6, 1918, he continued forward to his objective, and remained throughout the night under heavy fire in hope of keeping the ground gained until reinforcements came up.

Colonel, U. S. Marine Corps, attached to 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

His indomitable courage and leadership led to the complete success of the attack by two battalions of his regiment on Marcheville and Riaville. During the attacks these two towns changed hands four times, finally remaining in our possession until the troops were ordered to withdraw. Under terrific machine-gun and artillery fire he was the first to enter Marcheville, where he directed operations. Later, upon finding his party completely surrounded, he personally assisted in fighting the enemy off with pistol and hand grenades.

Major, Medical Corps, attached to 76th Artillery, 3d Division.

During the entire action Major Beasley braved the danger of continuous shellfire by constantly searching for wounded and administering treatment.

Posthumously awarded. Medal forwarded to Rufus L. Rigdon for delivery

Corporal, Company H, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.

He volunteered and led a patrol of 8 men, which located an enemy nest, attacked it, and brought back 40 prisoners, among them 2 wounded officers. Throughout the fight he showed marked personal bravery and ability in leading ration parties through heavy enemy barrages.

Sergeant, 101st Ambulance Company, 101st Sanitary Train, 26th Division.
Sergeant Beaton established a dressing station outpost under extremely heavy shellfire and cared for his wounded companions in the open under fire from enemy snipers and artillery.

Private, first class, sanitary detachment, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.
Voluntarily leaving shelter, he crossed an open field, subjected to heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, to give first aid to two wounded soldiers. His heroic action saved the lives of the wounded men.

Second lieutenant, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
Having remained at battalion headquarters, after the relief of hls battalion, when the German barrage preceding the second battle of the Marne opened, Lieutenant Beatty, realizing the gravity of the situation, voluntarily went out through heavy destructive fire on a recounsissance of the front lines and obtained information which could not be secured in any other manner. He encouraged the troops by his disregard for personal danger, and gave directions for the defense of the positions. It being necessary for him to remove his gas mask in order to accomplish this mission, he was seriously burned by mustard gas.

Sergeant, medical detachment, 306th Infantry, 77th Division. He went forward to dress the wounds of an officer who could not be brought in because of the exceedingly heavy machine-gun fire, his bravery being instru-mental in saving the officer's life. Throughout the entire day this soldier worked tirelessly at the dressing station under heavy shell fire until he was completely exhausted, showing a persistent devotion to duty.

Private, first class, Company G, 119th Infantry, 30th Division. When enemy machine-gun fire was holding up the advance of the line, Private Beaty carried ammunition forward and aided a comrade to knock an enemy nest out of action and kill a sniper who was inflicting heavy losses on our troops.

Captain, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He took command after his company commander had been evacuated, and, despite severe wounds, participated in many engagements, continuing until additional wounds forced his withdrawal from the field.

Sergeant, Company D, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.

During the exceptionally heavy bombardment of the enemy from July 23-26

Sergeant Beck volunteered and carried messages after wire communication had been destroyed and runners wounded by the heavy firing. He also aided in guiding parties in bringing food and ammunition to the front line.

Private, Company M, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.

In an attack on Cote Dame Marie the 126th Infantry was held up, owing to intense machine-gun fire and grenades. Private Beck volunteered as a member of a combat patrol which cut through the enemy lines, captured 10 machine guns, killed or captured 15 of the enemy, and forced a large number to surrender, clearing the Cote Dame Marie of the enemy, thus enabling the regiment to continue their advance.

Corporal, Company F, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.

After the remainder of his platoon had become casualties, Corporal Beck, with five other soldiers, succeeded in holding his platoon position against a flank attack by the enemy, inspiring his men by his courage to pour a deadly fire into the ranks of the approaching Germans. Though he was wounded by machine-gun bullet, he refused to leave his post until he was finally ordered to be evacuated.

First sergeant, Company L, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
During the attack on Juvigny, when all the officers in his company had been wounded, Sergeant Becker immediately took command of the company and led them in the attack. After the engagement he supervised and assisted in led them in the attack. After the engagement he supervised and assisted in the work of clearing the field of wounded, working under incessant machinegun and artillery fire. In the Argonne Woods, Oct. 8, when the advance of his organization was held up by cleverly concealed enemy machine guns, Sergeant Becker, with an officer, exposed himself to the enemy fire while recompositering the enemy positions. As a result of their observations the company was successfully disposed with only three casualties.

Second lieutenant, Infantry, attached to 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps. Lieutenant Becker went forward in advance of his platoon and destroyed a machine-gun nest, thereby preventing the death or injury of many men of his command. His self-sacrificing courage permitted his platoon to advance, but, as he completed the performance of this noble work, he himself was killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, J. B. Becker.

First sergeant, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.

At imminent peril to his own life, Sergeant Beckwith and two companions extinguished a fire in an ammunition dump, caused by a bursting shell, thereby preventing the explosion of the dump and saving the lives of a large number of men who were in the vicinity.

Sergeant, first class, Company B, 4th Engineers, 4th Division. He went forward, exposed to intense rifle, machine-gun, and artillery fire, and carried on his back, with the assistance of another soldier, a badly wounded comrade to a shell hole, thus saving the life of the wounded soldier. In the performance of this act Sergeant Bedolfe was severely wounded.

Second lieutenant, pilot, 50th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
With Second Lieut, Franklin D. Bellows, observer, he executed a reconnaissance mission early in the morning of the second day of the St. Mihiel offensive in spite of the clouds, high wind, mist, dlying at an altitude of only 300 meters and without protection of accompanying battle planes. Although subjected to severe fire from ground batteries, they penetrated 8 kilometers behind the German lines. His motor was badly damaged and his observer, Lieutenant Bellows, was mortally wounded. Despite these conditions he succeeded in bringing the disabled machine safely to his lines.

Second lieutenant, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.

During the terrific artillery bombardment of the German offensive of July 15, 1918, Lieutenant Beebe carried a wounded man 300 yards to a dressing

For extraordinary heroism in action near Fismes, France, Aug. 11, 1913. Under the protection of three pursuit planes, each carrying a pilot and an observer, Lieutenants Bernheimer and Jordan, in charge of a photo plane, carried out successfully a hazardous photographic mission over the enemy's line to the River Aisne. The 4 American ships were attacked by 12 enemy battle planes. Lieutenant Bernheimer, by cooly and skillfully manenvering his ship, and Lieutenant Jordan, by accurate operation of his machine gun, in spite of wounds in the shoulder and leg, aided materially in the victory which came to the American ships, and returned safely with 36 valuable photographs. The pursuit plane operated by Lieutenants Hitchcock and Burns was disabled while these two officers were fighting effectively. Lieutenant Burns was mortally wounded and his body jammed the controls. After a headlong fall of 2,500 meters, Lieutenant Hitchcock succeeded in regaining control of this plane and piloted it back to his airdrome. Lieutenants McClendon and Plummer were shot down and killed after a vigorous combat with 5 of the enemy's planes. Lieutenants Babcock and Palmer, by gallant and skillful fighting, aided in driving off the German planes and were materially responsible for the successful execution of the photographic mission.

Private, Company E, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.

Private Berry was a member of a patrol cleaning up a trench, when an enemy grenade was thrown into the midst of the group. With notable presence of mind and entire disregard for his own safety, Private Berry seized the grenade and threw it over the parapet, where it exploded an instant later, thereby saving the lives of his comrades.

Private, Company B, 140th Infantry, 35th Division. Although seriously wounded, Private Berry, disregarding the danger, advanced alone on a reconnaissance under heavy machine-gun fire and brought back important information of the enemy.

Private, Company A, 61st Infantry, 5th Division. In the attack on the town of Lion-devant-Dun, Private Berry's company was halted by heavy machine-gun fire. Advancing ahead and urging his comrades to follow, he succeeded in gaining a foothold in the town, until he was felled by the murderous fire of the enemy guns.

Private, first class, Company D, 120th Infantry, 30th Division. With eight other soldiers, comprising the company headquarters detachment, he assisted his company commander in cleaning out enemy dugouts along a canal and capturing 242 prisoners.

Corporal, Battery C, 13th Field Artillery, 4th Division.
When an enemy shell struck his battery position, setting fire to a powder dump and killing or wounding 30 men, Corporal Berwick, though himself wounded, went into the burning dump at imminent risk to his life and assisted in extinguishing the flames. He then assisted in removing the other men before securing aid for himself. Refusing to be evacuated, he reported back to his battery with one arm in a sling and resumed his place as gunner.

Private, Company L, 355th Infantry, 89th Division.
Although wounded by machine-gun fire, he refused first aid and continued in the engagement for two days without treatment.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 15th Field Artillery, 2d Division.

Near Chateau-Thierry he repeatedly exposed himself to heavy shell and gas bombardments in order to maintain telephone communication between the Infantry and Artillery posts of command. Near Thiaucourt, on Sept. 17, he accompanied the first wave of Infantry, carrying a projector, and, in spite of the heavy shellfier, kept the Artillery informed of the progress of the attack.

He was killed near Somme-Py, France, on Oct. 7, while in the faithful per formers of bis days. formance of his duty

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Mabel Hansen.

Private, Company E, 305th Infantry, 77th Division. During an attack on a series of strong enemy machine-gun nests Private Best took charge of company hisson and voluntarily carried messages to all the platoons of the company, exposing himself fearlessly to sweeping machinegun fire.

Sergeant, Company D, 15th Machine Gun Battalion, 5th Division. When the footbridges over the Meuse River were destroyed by artillery fire, Sergeant Bevan volunteered and assisted in repairing the damage under violent machine-gun fire. On the night of November 4, while leading his platoon across the footbridge, part of it was blown away and he fell into the water, but pulling himself out, he continued to lead his men, regardless of the cold and extreme fatigue. Later he exposed himself to the enemy fire while cerving a vounded treat to a place of safety. while carrying a wounded man to a place of safety.

Corporal, Company E, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
Corporal Bible, aided by a comrade, advanced under heavy fire upon an enemy machine-gun position which was causing severe losses to their company.
Disregarding personal danger, they silenced the machine gun and thus enabled their company to continue the advance with few losses.

Corporal, Company H, 16th Infantry, 1st Division. Without assistance he attacked an enemy machine gun which was located in a tree and dislodged the gun, but was himself killed while performing this courageous duty ergeant, Company D, 9th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division. With no infantry support, his platoon withstood an enemy attack for two days, during which time two of his men and one gun were captured. Captain, 13th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Jesse Bickford.

During an engagement between 11 Spads and 12 enemy Fokkers, Captain Biddle, perceiving a comrade in distress from the attack of two planes, dived upon them and by his fire forced them to withdraw. His prompt action saved the life of his comrade, who was in imminent danger of being shot to the ground.

Wagoner, 110th Ambulance Company, 103d Sanitary Train, 28th Division. Because of the destruction from shell fire of 10 of the 13 ambulances of his company, he worked for 72 hours, 48 of them without rest, driving through a shell-swept and gas-infested area, and thereby making possible the evacuation of the wounded.

Private, Company M, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
Under terrific machine-gun fire, he advanced through 40 feet of wire entanglements, hacking his way with his bayonet, so that his platoon could pass through to their objective. He was mortally wounded by enemy fire as he finished his work.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Wiktavia Laysienska.

First sergeant, Company H, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.

with utter disregard for his own safety, he dressed the wounds of many of his comrades under the intense machine-gun and rifle fire from the enemy's lines. On Sept. 8 he rescued a wounded oflicer from a heavy barrage, carried him to a place of safety, and dressed his wounds.

Sergeant, Company A, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.

During the operations against the Hindenburg line, Sergeant Bilitzki, although twice wounded, refused to leave the field, but remained with his platoon, exhibiting magnificent courage and bravery, until he was wounded a third time. His devotion to duty set a splendid example to the men of his company.

Sergeant, Company H, 61st Infantry, 5th Division.

He voluntarily went forward alone against an enemy machine-gun nest, which was holding up the advance of his line, wounding and capturing one prisoner and putting the remaining occupant to flight.

Sergeant, Company A, 113th Infantry, 29th Division.
With disregard for his personal safety, he saved the life of an officer of his eompany by attacking and killing two Germans who were about to strike the officer in the back. Later the same day he attacked, of his own accord, several machine-gun nests, always returning with prisoners, machine guns, or both or both.

Private, medical detachment, 47th Infantry, 4th Division. He displayed conspicuous bravery by administering first aid to wounded soldiers in areas swept by shell and machine-gun fire.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 7th Field Artillery, 1st Division.
He voluntarily and constantly was exposed to shellfire to repair important telephone lines. During the performance of this work he lost an arm and was otherwise seriously injured.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Anthony Bills.

Corporal, Company D, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

During the operations against the Hindenburg line Corporal Bingham left shelter and went forward, crawling on his hands and knees under heavy machine-gun fire to the aid of a wounded officer and a wounded soldier. With the assistance of another soldier he succeeded in dragging and carrying them back to the shelter of a trench.

Private, Company I, 168th Infantry, 42d Division. He sought and obtained permission to go out in front of our lines and recover his corporal, who was lying severely wounded in the open. He crossed an open area that was swept for more than 50 yards by enemy machine guns, reached the corporal and carried him safely back into our lines. Later he was wounded, but refused to go to the aid station until his company had won its objective Second lieutenant, 342d Machine Gun Battalion, 89th Division.

Although suffering from a wound received during the action of Nov. 1, Lieutenant Birch refused to go to the rear for treatment, but continued on duty with his platoon throughout a very critical period. He remained on duty until the morning of Nov. 11, when he was killed.

First licutenant, 6th Engineers, 3d Division.
He, on his own initiative, took 12 men from his platoon and charged a number of machine-gun nests which had been holding up the advance for two hours.
Attacking them across open ground, he cleaned out the nests and captured 42 prisoners. In attacking other nests in the vicinity he lost his life. His courageous act made it possible for the attacking troops to gain and hold the woods with a minimum number of casualties.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Herman H. Birney.

First lientenant, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
Rendered unconscious by a bursting shell, which wounded his company commander, Lieutenant Bischoff took command of his company as soon as he regained consciousness and later assumed command of the battalion when the battalion commander was gassed. After being relieved of command he went forward on a reconnaissance with one soldier, and the two of them alone captured 75 of the enemy.

Private, Company B, 115th Infantry, 29th Division.
While under intense machine-gun and artillery fire he disregarded his personal safety, administered first-aid to a wounded comrade near him, and was instantly killed by a shell.

Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Minnie Biscr. Posthumously awarded.

Private, first class, Company G, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Against the advice of his companions he advanced through intense artillery and machine-gun fire against an enemy machine gun which was maintaining a damaging fire on his company. Single-handed he killed the crew of this gun, returning to our lines with the captured gun.

Second licutenant, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

He was in command of a working party of about 30 men on the night of Feb. 28, 1918. He encountered a heavy barrage of the enemy, which protected the advance of enemy assault troops. With coolness and courage he immediately placed his men in shell holes, fought off the enemy, and twice walked through the enemy's and our own barrage to recover the remains of one of his party and to collect his own men.

First licutenant, 148th Acro Squadron, Air Service.
While a member of a flight he was attacked by greatly superior numbers of encmy planes. Licutenant Bissell, observing an American plane attacked by eight of the enemy, dived into their midst, destroying one plane, wherenpon he was set upon by three enemy Fokkers, one of which he shot down, driving the remaining planes to their own lines. His own plane was so badly crippled as to be beyond repair. The outstanding bravery displayed by Licutenant Bissell greatly inspired the members of his squadron.

Private, first class, Headquarters Company, 120th Field Artillery, 32d Division. Throughout two days he maintained the telephone lines running into hattalion headquarters, making frequent repairs of the lines amid falling walls and heavy bombardment by both gas and high-explosives shells.

Captain, 13th Minnesota Volunteer Infantry

Though wounded, he commanded a firing line at a critical stage of the combat and continued to command and encourage his men after having been wounded a second time, until he was compelled to be removed from the field.

Captain, Medical Corps, attached to 28th Infantry, 1st Division. He went over the top to the attack in the first wave and was wounded on the morning of the first day. Disregarding his wound, he pressed on with the attacking troops and crossed and recrossed the sector inunediately behind the most advanced wave, rendering first aid to wounded and placing them in shell holes. He worked unceasingly without sleep or rest and was again wounded on the fourth day by shell fire. Though twice wounded, he steadily refused to be evacuated until the evening of the fourth day, when he was exhausted and suffering from his wounds.

Private, Company E, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.

Private, first class, Company B, 103d Machine Gun Battalion, 26th Division. During an enemy attack, Private Blake, although not on duty, first discovered the presence of the enemy and gave the alarm. During the action four of the enemy attempted to flank one of the machine-gun positions. Private Blake killed one of the flanking group with his pistol and captured the other three unaided.

First lieutenant, pilot, Air Service, U. S. Army, attached to French Army. Lieutenant Blake, with Second Lieut. Earle W. Porter, observer, while on a reconnaissance expedition at a low altitude far beyond the enemy lines, was attacked by five German battle planes. His observer was wounded at the beginning of the combat, but he maneuvered his plane so skillfully that the observer was able to shoot down one of their adversaries. By more skillfull manuevering he enabled his observer to fight off the remaining planes and returned safely to friendly territory.

First lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. When the line was temporarily held up, he volunteered and maintained liaison with the 49th Company, continually crossing and recrossing an open field swept by intense machine-gun fire. Later in the engagement he established liaison with the French unit on the left flank, crossing a wheat field under the engagement of the continuation of the left flank crossing a wheat field the court meaning grant depiction flow and activated with whale heads. under heavy machine-gun and sniping fire, and returned with valuable information.

Sergeant, Company D, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.

After being wounded by machine-gun fire, he treated his wound himself and continued to lead his men under heavy shell and machine-gun fire until he was again wounded and ordered to a first-aid station.

First sergeant, Company B, 5th Machine Gun Battalion, 2d Division. He volunteered to carry an important message across an area swept by machine-gun fine. He arrived at the company post of command with the message, and fell dead from a wound he received while in the execution of his mission. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Mrs. Pearl Creamer.

Sergeant, Company D, 26th Infantry, 1st Division. He led a patrol of 10 men against a strong enemy machine-gun position, flanking the strong point and attacking it from the rear with admirable judgment. After expending all his ammunition, this soldier continued to fight with two captured Luger pistols and himself killed eight of the enemy, in spite of being wounded. Nine machine-gun nests were wiped out as a result of this attack, and the position was organized for defense with the captured guns.

Private, Company G, 120th Infantry, 30th Division. He displayed marked personal bravery, capturing single-handed seven Germans whom he came upon in a trench and dugout. While taking the prismans whom he came upon in a trench and dugout. While taking the prisoners to the rear, he met a wounded soldier, and preferring to return to the firing line, turned the prisoners over to the wounded man and rejoined his squad.

Major, 327th Infantry, 82d Division. Diving 14 days of severe fighting he was constantly on duty with his battalion, although suffering severely from bronchitis, the result of being gassed. He personally took command of a company, after all the officers had become easualties, and led them through a heavy artillery barrage and machine-gun fire, gaining his objective. Immediately after his battalion was relieved he collapsed from the severe strain.

Corporal, Company B, 344th Battalion, Tank Corps. Corporal Blanchard, in company with an officer, crawled forward under heavy fire at the risk of his own life and dragged back a wounded man who was lying about 150 meters in front of our trenches.

Corporal, Company A, 104th Infantry, 26th Division.

Although wounded and ordered to the rear, he continued to lead his platocon after his sergeant had been killed and continued in command until he dropped from exhaustion.

Captain, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
He demonstrated exceptional ability in organizing his line at Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, and showed heroic leadership in holding it under violent attack. His company successfully repelled two assaults by superior forces, in the second of which he was mortally wounded.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. John Blanchfield.

Corporal, Company C, 5th Field Signal Battalion, 3d Division. During the intense artillery bombardment preparatory to the great German offensive of July 15 he voluntarily led a medical officer to the aid of wounded men, following broken wire through woods. He guided the party on their return over the same route, although suffering from a severe wound.

Private, first class, Company D, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.

During a heavy shell and gas bombardment he made repeated trips with messages to the various plateons, at the same time volunteering and assisting in the removal of the wounded to a place of safety.

Private, Headquarters Company, 30th Infantry, 3d Division. He remained with his gun during a heavy bombardment until his gun pit was blown in and then removed his gun to another position and continued the fire under heavy machine-gun fire. Later, in the same action, he volunteered and went to reconnoiter a small woods believed to be occupied by enemy troops. There he killed several Germans single handed and returned to our lines with an American soldier.

First lieutenant, 6th Machine Gun Battalion, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. On several occasions, regardless of his personal safety, he led his machine-gun platoon through heavy machine-gun and artillery fire. When the infantry company which he was supporting was halted by the fire of 2 enemy Maxims he formed his plateon as infantry and assaulted and captured both the enemy guns.

Sergeant, Company A, 59th Infantry, 4th Division.
When his company was held up by heavy artillery and machine-gun fire Sergeant Bleau displayed exceptional bravery and devotion to duty in leading his platoon across an open field in an attack upon an enemy machine-gun nest.

Even after receiving a wound from the effects of which he died next morning he remained with his men, encouraging them on and inspiring them by his fortitude.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Charles Bleau.

Private, Company C, 9th Field Signal Battalion, 5th Division.

Although he was almost exhausted from gas and fatigue, Private Bleazard remained on duty throughout the day and night, laying telephone lines from the regimental relay station to the front line through heavy barrage fire from artillery and machine guns.

Corporal, Company E, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.

Although exposed to severe artillery fire, this noncommissioned officer kept the automatic rifle teams under his command in action, thus causing very heavy casualties to the enemy, who were attempting to cross the Marne River in boats. The stubborn resistance of this unit prevented the enemy from gaining a foothold at a critical point of our lines. While encouraging his men to greater efforts he was killed by shell fire.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, George Blessing.

Private, Company A, 9th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.

After being wounded in the arm by shrapnel Private Blewett continued on duty with his platoon until it was relieved four days later. He then joined another platoon going back to the line and remained in action until the condition of his wound necessitated his evacuation.

Private, Company A, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

After several other runners had failed he volunteered and was successful in carrying a message through an intense machine-gun and artillery barrage.

Sergeant, Company B, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.
From a shell hole, in which he had taken shelter while returning from a successful daylight patrol across the Vesle River, Sergeant Blohm saw a corporal of his patrol dragging himself through the grass and bleeding profusely from a wound in the neck. He unhesitatingly left his shelter, carried the corporal behind a tree near the river bank, dressed his wound, and using boughs from a fallen tree as improvised raft towed the injured man across the river and carried him 200 yards over an open field to the American outpost line, all under continuous rific and machine-gun fire.

First lieutenant, 127th Infantry, 32d Division. Inspiring his men by his own personal bravery, he vigorously led his company forward in the face of heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, capturing the heights overlooking Juvingy with many prisoners. After reaching the objective he repeatedly exposed himself to hostile fire time after time in reorganizing the line. During the defense of the position won he personally set up and operated a captured German machine gun against the enemy while under terrific fire.

Private, sanitary detachment, 106th Infantry, 27th Division.
During the operations against the Hindenburg line, east of Ronssoy, on Sept. 27, 1918, Private Blomgren displayed unusual courage and bravery by going forward through the terrific shell and machine-gun fire to rescue wounded comrades.

Crossing an exposed area under heavy shell and machine-gun fire he went rossing an exposed area under heavy snell and maemine-gun hire he were forward and rescende a wounded contrade, carrying him 200 yards up a steep slope. On another occasion, during a severe artillery and machine-gun bombardment, he crept alone to an advanced post and earried back another wounded soldier. During the 5 days' action he gave first aid treatment to 20 members of his company, inspiring everyone by his valiant conduct in ministering to the weighted.

First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 103d Infantry, 26th Division. He remained with his battalion during the entire advance, working untiringly under heavy enemy fire at all times, superintending the evacuation of the wounded and earing for them in the most dangerous and exposed positions. On July 22 he established his dressing station in an advanced position that was constantly under shell fire, and many times left his station to go into the front lines to treat the wounded

Private, first class, Company B, 312th Infantry, 78th Division. During the period of 5 days that his company was occupying an advanced and isolated position Private Bloomberg volunteered and carried messages to his company headquarters after seeing 2 other runners wounded in the attempt to cross through the sweeping barrage. He was at all times under constant fire and observation of enemy machine gunners, but he succeeded in establishing liaison during the entire operations.

Private, Company I, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
While engaged as runner during an attack he maintained liaison with adjoining units throughout a most intense fire of artillery and machine guns, continuing his work until wounded by machine-gun fire.

Corporal, Company C, 319th Infantry, 80th Division.
While his platoon was being held up by wire and other obstacles and the fire of the enemy threatened to annihilate it he made his way through the wire to the German trenches, from which position he bombed the enemy from their trenches. He thus saved the lives of many of his comrades and enabled them to take the trenches with a minimum of casualties.

Private, first class, Company C, 312th Infantry, 78th Division. He volunteered to earry a message from his platoon across a zone of 200 yards swept by heavy artillery and machine-gun fire. He was seriously wounded while making the attempt to perform the mission, and remained under this terrific fire for over 2 hours before it was possible to rescue him.

Private, medical detachment, 128th Infantry, 32d Division. As he was dressing wounded inen and earrying them into shell holes for protection a heavy—barrage was put down in the field where he was working, but he nevertheless refused to seek cover, ministering to the wounded and reassuring them until he was mortally wounded by a bursting shell.

First lieutenant, 168th Infantry, 42d Division.

Leading his own and another company by a flanking movement around Hill 288 in the face of terrific machine-gun fire, Lieutenant Bly, with remarkable courage and skill, reached the enemy's line and effected the capture of a strongly fortified and entrenched position on the crest of the hill, together with numerous machine guns, 92 prisoners, and I minenwerfer. He personally took charge of the minenwerfer and turned it on the enemy, firing all their available animunition. During these operations this officer himself killed or captured two complete machine-gun crews. Later in the day he again led his company forward and captured Hill 242, together with another minenwerfer, under circumstances which required the greatest determination and courage. courage.

Private, first class, section No. 554, Ambulance Service. Throughout the attack north of Somme-Py he worked day and night, repeatedly driving over roads under constant shell fire to the advance dressing stations, and when necessary driving to points still farther to the front. On Oct. 3, in front of the advanced Infantry post, his ambulance was wrecked by a bursting shell. Securing another car, he evacuated the wounded.

Sergeant, Company L, 127th Infantry, 32d Division. When his company was stopped by a concealed machine-gun nest, Sergeant Bonack ascertained its position and courageously attacked it, single handed, upon his own initiative, killing the crew and enabling his company to continue the advance.

Private, Company B, 309th Infantry, 78th Division.
Private Bonavantura, armed with an automatic rifle, captured a machine gun single-handed under heavy flanking fire from machine guns. The gun was supported by a squad of infantry, whom he forced to dee. Later he led a detail far into the enemy lines, encouraging his men by his fearless example.

Private, 45th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Private Bonday, as a runner, displayed exceptional courage in carrying messages for three days under shell and machine-gun fire.

Second licutenant, 17th Field Artillery, 2d Division.
While serving as a telephone officer, he crossed an open field in full view of the enemy and under constant bombardment three times to repair telephone lines vitally necessary to keep six batteries in operatiou.

On Aug. 13, 1918, this officer led 2 other machines on a long photographic reconnaissance. In spite of the presence of numerous enemy aircraft, they were able to take all the photographs required, but were attacked by 6 Fokker were able to take all the photographs required, but were attacked by a Pokker biplanes. During the combat Lieutenant Bonnalle saw that one of his accompanying machines was in difficulty and that an enemy airplane was nearly on its tail. He at once broke off combat with the enemy with whom he was engaged and dived to the assistance of the machine in trouble. He he was engaged and dived to the assistance of the machine in trouble. He drove off the enemy plane, regardless of the bullets which were ripping up his own machine. Eventually, however, his tail planes and his elevator wires were shot away and his machine began to fall in side slips. Lieutenant Bonnalie managed to keep his machine facing toward the British lines by means of the rudder control, while his observer and the third machine drove off the enemy aircraft, which was still attacking. In its damaged condition Lieutenant Bonnalie's machine was tail heavy, and he therefore had his observer leave his cockpit and lie out along the cowl in front of the pilot. In this manner he recrossed the British trenches at a low altitude and righted his machine sufficiently to avoid a fatal crash. Had it not been for the gallantry of Lieutenaut Bonnalie the injured machine to whose assistance he went would have fallen into enemy territory, as pilot had been wounded and its would have fallen into enemy territory, as pilot had been wounded and its observer killed. Lieutenant Bonnalie's own machine was riddled with bullets and it was a marvelous performance to bring it safely to the ground.

Private, Headquarters Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

For extraordinary heroism in action on June 6, 1918, when he volunteered and assisted in taking a truck load of ammunition and material into Bouresches, France, over a road swept by artillery and machine-gun fire, thereby relieving a critical situation.

First lieutenant, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.
With complete disregard for his own safety, he rescued two wounded soldiers under an extremely heavy barrage of machine-gun fire by which they were surrounded. Unassisted, he carried both men through a hail of fire to the nearest dressing station, his great courage and devotion to duty undoubtedly saving their lives.

Corporal, Company D, 31st Infantry.

He distinguished himself on numerous occasions by his capabilities and extraordinary daring as a patrol leader while under fire, notably at Kazanka, Siberia, July 1, 1919, and in the lower Suchan Valley, Siberia, July 5, 1919.

Passed assistant surgeon, U. S. Navy, attached to 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

On two successive days the regimental aid station in which he was working was struck by heavy shells and in each ease demolished. Ten men were killed and a number of wounded were badly hurt by falling timbers and stone. Under these harassing conditions this officer continued without eessation his treatment of the wounded, superintending their evacuation, and setting an inspiring example of heroism to the officers and men serving under him. On June 25, 1918, Surgeon Boone followed the attack by one battalion against enemy machine-gun positions in the Bois-de-Belleau, establishing advanced dressing stations under continuous shell fire.

Private, Company M, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.

First lieutenant, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
While conducting a raid in the Luneville sector, Lieutenant Bootz exposed himself to heavy enemy fire to carry a severely wounded soldier to a place of safety. He later reorganized a patrol to search for missing members of his raiding party. Near Meurcy Farm, July 28, this officer gallantly led his company until he was severely wounded. He then continued to direct the operations of his organization until the position was consolidated.

Second lieutenant, Signal Corps, U. S. Army, 90th Aero Squadron, Air Service. While carrying out a difficult contact mission without the protection of friendly planes he was attacked by three hostile machines, which he succeeded in driving off. He secured the information he sought, but while attempting to fire a signal rocket it exploded, setting the machine on fire. Lieutenant Borden crawled back on the fuselage of the machine and extinguished the flames with his bare hands. Although suffering great pain, he refused to be sent to the rear for treatment, but remained on duty with his squadron.

Private, medical detachment, 354th Infantry, 89th Division. He showed great bravery and extraordinary heroism by dressing and evacuating the wounded under a terrific shell fire. While advancing with the front echelon, he saw a comrade fall when a withering machine-gun fire was encountered and, without hesitation, ran to his rescue, carrying the wounded man to the shelter of a shell hole.

Sergeant, Company C, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.

In charge of a flank patrol of four men during an attack, he entered a village occupied by the enemy in force and captured 42 prisoners and 3 machine guns which were holding up the advance of the battalion from the left flank. He displayed marked courage and ability as a leader.

Corporal, Company H, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

Although severely wounded and ordered to dressing station, he returned to the front lines, rejoined his company and voluntarily joined a patrol which attacked and routed enemy machine-gun crews. The officer in command of the patrol having been killed, Corporal Boretz assumed command thereof and divested the enture of an enemy machine-gun crew of four men and directed the capture of an enemy machine-gun crew of four men.

Corporal, Company B, 1st Engineers, 1st Division. Corporal, Company 18, 18t Engineers, 1st Division.

Upon his own initiative, Corporal Borkus, with another soldier, displayed notable courage in attacking two machine guns which were hindering the advance. Undaunted by the heavy machine-gun fire, they poured a deadly rille fire upon the enemy gunners and forced them to flee toward our attacking troops, who captured them.

Regimental supply sergeant, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
Hearing that the wounded at a dressing station had no means of evacuation, he took four escort wagons over shell-swept territory and carried the men to an ambulance station. He then established ambulance service between this point and the battalion dressing station.

Private, medical detachment, 2d Engineers, 2d Division. Exposed to enemy sniper and machine-gun fire, Private Boyd went in front of our lines to administer aid to a wounded officer and also to wounded enemy He also crawled to within 50 feet of an enemy machine gun and assisted in bringing a wounded comrade to safety.

Second lieutenant, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.

Assuming command of his company after all other company officers had become casualties or were lost in the fog, Lleutenant Boyd, although wounded in the arm by shell fragments, skillfully led his company forward under a heavy hostile artillery fire until their objective was reached and the position consolidated, when he consented to go to the rear for treatment. During the advance through the heavy fog Lieutenant Boyd, by his personal leadership, kept the company intact, thereby making possible the capture of 100 prisoners by his organization.

Second lieutenant, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.

After his platoon had suffered severe casualties, and his arumunition entirely exhausted. Lieutenant Boyd went about the town, under annihilating fire, to collect the stragglers. With the few he managed to collect he attacked and put out of action three enemy machine-gun nests, after which he reported to the front line. Here he voluntarily exposed himself in assisting wounded from the face of murderous fire, and while standing in full view of the enemy, directing his men to seek shelter, he was killed by a shell explosion.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Ben S. Boyd.

This officer, being detailed for the protection of a photographic mission with five other planes, proceeded on his mission, when three of the escorting planes failed to join the formation. While flying near Conflans the formation engaged in combat with five enemy pursuit planes. Wounded in both legs, the left foot, and the right elbow, he displayed exceptional tenacity and courage by continuing to fire his guns until the enemy were put to flight.

First lieutenant, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.

During the attack of his company, displaying exceptional bravery and disregard of personal danger, Lieutenant Boyd went forward in the face of a heavy machine-gun fire, and in full view of the enemy carried a badly wounded soldier to safety in a near-by shell hole. His gallant conduct was an excellent example and an inspiration to his company.

Sergeant, Company B, 105th Infantry, 27th Division. During the operation against the Hindenburg line Sergeant Boykin, with an officer and two other sergeants, occupied an outpost position in advance of the line, which was attacked by a superior torce of the enemy. Sergeant Boykin assisted in repulsing this attack and in killing 10 Germans, capturing 5, and driving off the others. The bravery and determination displayed by this group was an inspiration to all who witnessed it.

Sergeant, Company M, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

Consolidating remnants of other platoons with his own, he advanced against violent machine-gun fire of the enemy. He directed an attack against two nests, which were reduced, and his objective gained. While reconnoitering in front of his objective he was severely wounded.

Private, first class, Company L, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
Without regard for his own safety, Private Bradley worked unceasingly as a stretcher bearer, caring for the wounded of other companies as well as of those of his own, and inspiring others to greater efforts by his example of courage and endurance.

Sergeant, Company D, 317th Infantry, 80th Division.

He was wounded in the head while leading his platoon across a valley swept by machine-gun fire, but he continued to lead his men on to their objective, refusing to report to the dressing station until he was ordered to do so.

Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 165th Infantry, 42d Division. When an enemy shell struck the gun position of his squad near Ancerviller, France, severely wounding him, Private Bradley coolly removed the gun to a place of safety and returned for the tripod, being wounded for a second time in so doing. Near Meurcy Farm this soldier assumed leadership of his squad after his corporal was severely wounded in the arm by a machine-gun bullet until the objective had been taken and the line firmly established. During the advance on the enemy position near Landres-et-8t. Georges, Private Bradley again displayed conspicuous coolness and courage in taking charge of his section, after the section sergeaut had been wounded, and directing the placing and firing of the guns.

Private, Company F, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
When a party of 25 of the enemy threatened the advance by machine-gun fire from a sunken road, Private Bradley, who was abead of the front line, quickly got his automatic rifle into action, and by well-directed enflading fire killed a large number of the enemy, capturing the remainder. His timely act prevented an interruption of the attack.

Sergeant, Company A, 61st Infantry, 5th Division.

His company being left without officers, he reorganized the company under severe shellfire. With absolute disregard for his personal safety, he led the company against machine-gun emplacements until he was killed.

fire. The first gun was successfully reached, a German officer and one of the crew killed, and the gun captured. In the dash for the second gun the lieutenant was severely wounded. Corporal Bradsnyder gave him first-aid treatment and remained with him, protecting him from death or capture until aid arrived some time later.

Private, Company K, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
On many occasions, while his battalion was holding a position, Private Brady crawled far in advance of the outposts and, with glasses and compass, located enemy machine-gun positions. His work was done under most hazardous conditions and heaviest fire, but he succeeded after all other attempts had proved fatal.

When an enemy machine gun was holding up our advance he worked out alone in advance of our front lines and, getting in rear of the hostile position, captured the enemy gun and its crew. While advancing, Private Bremner showed utter disregard of the heavy artillery and machine-gun fire to which he was subjected.

Corporal, Company D, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.

During the heavy shelling in the Bois-de-Grimpettes he rendered himself conspicuous by exposing himself to great personal danger in order to give aid to wounded companions, frequently searching the woods for wounded soldiers. He aided seven comrades who had been badly wounded to places of safety. That afternoon he conducted a liaison officer from the position his company occupied forward through a barrage to the town of Cierges. When this officer had been wounded and gassed, Corporal Brennan assisted him to reach his destination and deliver his message. destination and deliver his message.

Sergeant, Company K, 328th Infantry, 82d Division.

After being severely wounded in the shoulder by a machine-gun bullet, Sergeant Brennan refused to be evacuated but remained in command of his company, to which he had succeeded after all the officers had become casualties. For four days he led his men in the operations against the enemy, though he was suffering severely, until his wound became infected, and he was evacuated against his protest.

Corporal, Company B, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.

After his platoon commander, platoon sergeant, and all other noncommissioned officers had become casualties, Corporal Brennan assumed command of his platoon, reorganized it under trying conditions, and continued the advance under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, inspiring his men by his coolness and leadership.

Second lieutenant, 322d Field Artillery, 83d Division.
As executive officer at a battery and responsible for the prompt delivery of the barrage to repel a counterattack by the enemy, he remained under heavy fire at his post after being severely wounded and successfully carried out his mission. His example of heroism was an inspiration to his men.

Private, Company L, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.
Secing the only other company runner killed while delivering a message of vital importance, Private Brenstuhl crawled from shell hole to shell hole during a rain of machine-gun bullets, took the message from the dead man, and completed the mission.

Major, pilot, corps observation wing, Air Service.

He, together with an observer, voluntarily and pursuant to a request for a special mission, left his airdrome and crossed the enemy's lines over Lironville and proceeded to Thiancourt. In spite of poor visibility, which forced them to fly at a very low altitude, and in spite of intense and accurate antiaircraft fire, they maintained their light along their course and obtained valuable information. Over Thiancourt they were suddenly attacked by four enemy monoplane Fokkers. Maneuvering his machine so that his observer could obtain a good field of fire, he entered into combat. His observer's guns becoming jammed, he withdrew until the jam was cleared, when he returned to the combat. His observer then becoming wounded, he coolly made a landing within friendly lines, although followed down by the enemy to within ing within friendly lines, although followed down by the enemy to within 25 meters of the ground. By this each he made himself an inspiration and example to all the members of his command.

Second lieutenaut, 168th Infantry, 42d Division.
He was in charge of a combat hiaison platoon during the offensive operations at Cote-de-Chatillon. When the leading companies were held up by intense concentrated machine-gun fire, he courageously led his platoon forward and penetrated the enemy's lines for a depth of 1 kilometer, his command being reduced by heavy easualties to only 12 men. In severe hand-to-hand fighting he captured 2 machine-gun nests and 40 prisoners, and obtained valuable information regarding the hostile positions, which enabled the leading companies to continue the advance.

First lieutenant, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.

While acting as battalion signal officer Lieutenant Bresnahan organized a detachment of orderlies, runners, and casuals and attacked a German patrol, which was completely routed.

Major, 326th Battalion, Tank Corps. On the opening day of the St. Mihiel offensive he led his battalion on foot from Richecourt to the Boise Quart de Reserve in the face of heavy machine-gun and artillery fire; by his coolness and courage setting an example to the entire battalion.

Major, 168th Infantry, 42d Division.
He personally led the assaulting wave of his battalion at St. Mihiel, continuing to the enemy's wire, despite the fact that he was wounded by a shell fragment. While directing his men through the wire entanglements, his right arm was shattered by a machine-gun bullet, but he remained on the field for more than an hour directing the disposition of his forces and giving careful directions. tions to the succeeding commander.

Sergeant, Company K, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.

Leading his platoon in attack, he encountered heavy machine-gun and shellfire, but he continued to press on, despite a severe wound which he received early in the fight. While his line was being held up by machine-gun fire he encouraged his men, despite a second wound, which shortly after compelled his removal from the field.

Corporal, Company H, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.
When his platoon sergeant was severely wounded during an attack on enemy machine-gun nests, Corporal Brewer took command of the platoon and led it forward. In so doing he was himself wounded, but he refused to seek medical aid until the objective had been reached and the platoon reorganized.

First lieutenant, 49th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
With First Lieut. Hugh L. Fontaine, he attacked nine enemy monoplanes (Fokkers) at an altitude of 4,000 meters. He dived into the midst of the enemy formation without consideration for his personal safety, subjecting himself to great danger. By the suddenness and extreme vehemence of his attack, the machines were driven into confusion. Although greatly outnumbered, he and Lieutenant Fontaine succeeded in shooting down two of the enemy.

First licutenant, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
With a total disregard for his own danger, Licutenant Brice went into the Bois d'Aigremont under a heavy artillery fire and led scattered troops to the new line of resistance near Fossoy, where they were successfully employed against the enemy's advance. Later, he successfully led his company into Le Charmel in the face of a heavy artillery and machine-gun fire and cleared that town of the enemy.

First lieutenant, 101st Infantry, 26th Division. Stubbornly resisting three strong enemy counterattacks, Lieutenant Brickley, without aid, went forward and by effective machine-gun fire drove the enemy from and captured a strong pill box which had been raising havec in our ranks.

Sergeant, Company F, 316th Engineers, 91st Division.
He volunteered to accompany an officer and three other soldiers on a reconnaissance patrol of the city of Audenarde. Entering under heavy shellfire, the party reconncitered the city for seven hours while it was still being patrolled by the enemy, advancing 2 kilometers in front of our own outposts and beyond those of the enemy.

Private, first class, Company D, 120th Infantry, 30th Division.
With eight other soldiers, comprising the company headquarters detachment, he assisted his company commander in clearing out enemy dugouts along a canal and capturing 242 prisoners.

Private, 51st Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Private Bridgford delivered an important message from his company to regimental headquarters. In the performance of this mission, exposed to heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, and in full view of enemy machine gunners, he swam the Meuse River. In spite of the great danger, he delivered the message as directed.

Private, first class, Company I, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

During the attack on Hill 360, north of Verdun, on Oct. 27, Private Brigando, in charge of a squad, made a desperate attempt to silence a machine gun which was holding up the advance of the entire company. The nature of the terrain made this attack more than hazardous, but Private Brigando nevertheless persisted until the entire squad, himself included, had become casualties.

Sergeant, Company D, 306th Machine Gun Battalion, 77th Division. Knowing that his commanding officers and three soldiers had been shot down and reported killed, he volunteered, obtained permission, and passed into a zone of heavy and continuous machine-gun fire to where his commades lay, to render first aid and to rescue them if alive, but unfortunately he found bis converded and his comrades dead.

Corporal, Company I, 47th Infantry, 4th Division.

Accompanied by another soldier, he renetrated the enemy's lines and patrolled a sector from the north bank of the River Vesle to the town of Bazoches. These two men entered an enemy dugout and killed two Germans, at the same time locating a machine-gun emplacement. Corporal Brigham, though wounded, completed his mission before obtaining first aid.

First sergeant, Company B, 348th Machine Gun Battalion, 91st Division. This soldier exemplified in the highest degree the spirit of bravery, devotion to duty, and self-sacrifice. Though he had been badly gassed during the action of Sept. 27, he maintained liaison between his company and the battalion post of command, at one time carrying an important message from the front to the artillery. On Sept. 29, though still suffering from the effects of gas, he refused to leave his company, and on a cold, rainy night brought up fresh ammunition over a rough, unfamiliar road in the dark through heavy shell-fire. He took part in the action on Tronsal Farm Hill Sept. 30, assisting in the direction and control of fire of the machine guns of his company. In the evening of Sept. 30 he was killed while taking a wounded soldier to the rear. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Ida M. Brimer.

Sergeant, Company B, 355th Infantry, 89th Division.
Without waiting orders he went forward against a concealed enemy machine gun which was holding up his platoon, killed the gunner, and captured four men, thereby enabling his platoon to continue the advance.

Mechanic, Battery B, 104th Field Artillery, 27th Division. When a continuous bombardment had set fire to the camouflage covering of a large ammunition dump of 75-millimeter shells and exploded nine of the shells, he, utterly disregarding his personal safety, left a sheltered position and ran to the dump and, with the aid of three other men, extinguished the fire, not only saving the ammunition but also preventing the exact location of the dump by the enemy.

Captain, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.

While commanding his company in action Captain Brinkley was wounded by shellfire, which fractured his jawbone in two places. He continued in command of his company, reorganizing it sufficiently to advance, when he was forced to withdraw because of the loss of speech.

Mechanic, Company A, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.

While his company was occupying a position on the forward slope of a hill, subjected to incessant sniping, machine-gun and artillery fire, Mechanic Brison voluntarily covered a large area searching for the wounded and administering first aid to them. He also carried important messages between the different units of his company.

Corporal, Company II, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.
While accompanying a patrol he swam the Meuse River to repair a footbridge.
It is exploit was accomplished under most severe fire of enemy machine guns and artillery, but his act enabled the patrol to cross the river and return with information of the utmost value.

Second lieutenant, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
Lieutenant Brittain by his aggressive spirit and action when out beyond the main Infantry line pushed forward unsupported with his platoon and captured 2 German officers, 94 men, and 8 machine guns. From this point of action Lieutenant Brittain with his platoon proceeded in a direction from which firing could be heard and by his quick decision captured 2 enemy field guns, caliber 105, and 6 trench mortars, and immediately thereafter attacked and captured 30 prisoners and 3 additional heavy machine guns.

Sergeant, Company I, 138th Infantry, 35th Division.

This soldier was in command of a platoon which became separated from the rest of the company in a heavy fog. Entering Varennes in advance of any other troops Sergeant Britton, with his command, occupied the southern edge of the town in the face of heavy machine-gun fire and took 24 prisoners. When he saw that the odds were hopelessly against him he successfully withdrew, with only one casualty. Later, after being gassed, he manifested exceptional courage and endurance by remaining on duty with his company and advancing in the attack.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Richard L. Britton.

Corporal, Company B, 344th Battalion, Tank Corps.
Corporal Broadfoot volunteered to drive a tank, and, his services being accepted, he attacked enemy machine-gun nests until his tank was put out of action, destroying several enemy nests which had held up our Infantry. He then continued the advance on foot until he was fatally wounded.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Annie H. Broadfoot.

Sergeant, Battery A, 103d Field Artillery, 26th Division.

He displayed exceptional bravery and devotion to duty during the action of Apr. 20, 1918, when, although wounded early in the engagement, he refused to leave his section, remaining on duty and keeping his gun in action until killed later in the day.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Firth Broadhead.

Private, 75th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Its succeeded in getting through the enemy's line and reached the nearest American forces and returned with reenforcements for his platoon.

Pharmacist's mate, third class, U. S. Navy, attached to 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

He displayed exceptional courage and devotion to duty by going through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire to the aid of a wounded officer belonging to another organization. After giving first-aid treatment to the officer he carried him back to shelter.

Second lientenant, 22d Aero Squadron, Air Service.
When his patrol was attacked by 12 enemy Fokkers over Mars-la-Tour, 8 miles within the enemy lines, he alone fought bravely and relentlessly with 8 of them, pursuing the fight from 5,000 meters to within a few meters of the ground, and though his right rudder control was out and his plane riddled with bullets, he destroyed 2 Fokkers, 1 falling out of control and the other bursting into flames.

Corporal, 83d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. In the Bois-de-Belleau, France, on June 8, 1918, he displayed great courage and disregard for personal safety in repeatedly going through heavy machine-gun fire with messages.

Captain, 76th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
Captain Brooks exposed himself to heavy and accurate artillery fire directed on an ammunition train while driving a loaded ammunition truck to safety, the driver of which had been killed by the enemy fire. This truck was attached to a burning truck, and the prompt action of Captain Brooks averted a possible explosion which would have caused serious losses.

First lieutenant, 1st Engineers, 1st Division.

Exposing himself to intense machine-gun and artillery fire, Lieutenant Brooks personally reconnoitered the ground over which an attack was to be made. He then skillfully led his men in a successful attack on the village, which was defended by machine guns and a 77-nillimeter gun firing on the advancing troops. Lieutenant Brooks coolly led his platoon in the face of this fire until they were near enough to put the enemy gunners to rout by rifle fire.

Private, 79th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He was conspicuous for heroic action in placing his body in front of his platoon leader while under heavy machine-gun fire, in order that he might dress the officer's wounds. He was shot twice in the hip while shielding the body of his leader.

Sergeant, Company K, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.

After his lieutenant had been seriously wounded. Sergeant Brooks took command of the platoon and led it with marked ability for seven days. Later, in the Argonne-Meuse engagement, he personally led his platoon against a machine gun which was holding up the advance of our line and destroyed the gun.

Private, first class, Company C, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

Private Brooks, as a runner, carried messages through artillery and machinegun fire. He was of great value to his company commander, as he was at all times performing tasks involving great hazard. On one occasion he advanced beyond the lines and located an enemy machine gun, returned to our lines, secured a squad, and gallantly assisted in the capture of the gun and crew.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, D. S. Brown.

Sergeant, Company M, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
When his platoon had been driven back by a concentrated machine-gun barrage and his platoon commander had been seriously wounded and had fallen on the field, Sergeant Brown and another soldier volunteered and brought the officer back to our lines.

Sergeant, Company G, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.
During the attack on the Cote-de-Chatillon, after having been severely wounded and gassed, he refused to go to the hospital, realizing that his presence with his platoon, which had suffered heavy casualties, would greatly assist in the attack. He reorganized his platoon and personally led it in the attack, later consolidating his positions, thereby setting an example of utter disregard for danger and inspiring his men by his remarkable courage and devotion to duty.

Private, Company A, 110th Machine Gun Battalion, 29th Division. He voluntarily went into a sector that was under an intense barrage of enemy artillery, machine-gun, and gas-shell fire and assisted in bringing a wounded comrade to the first-aid station.

Private, Company C, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

During the time when his company was isolated in the Argonne Forest and cut off from communication with friendly troops Private Brown, together with another soldier, volunteered to carry a message through the German lines, although he was aware that several unsuccessful attempts had been previously made by patrols, the members of which were either killed, wounded, or driven back. By his courage and determination he succeeded in delivering the message and brought relief to his battaliou.

Sergeant, Company E, 120th Infantry, 30th Division.

Wounded twice at the start of an advance, he remained in command of his platoon, carrying it through to a position near its objective, when he was wounded a third time and forced to retire. His personal courage was an inspiration to the men under him.

Private, 55th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. After all the other members of his squad had become casualties Private Brown, single-handed, charged and captured a hostile machine gun. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John W. Brown.

Private, Company E, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

Private Brown, aided by his corporal, advanced upon a machine-gun position which was causing severe losses to their company. Disregarding personal danger, they silenced the machine gun, thus enabling their company to continue the advance with few losses.

Sergeant, Battery F, 76th Field Artillery, 3d Division. He kept in repair the telephone lines which were constantly being broken by the heavy shelling, remaining at this hazardous task until killed by an enemy shell.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Thomas Brown.

Corporal, Company A, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
Having been detailed to carry ratious to another company of his regiment, and learning upon his arrival there that an attack was imminent, Corporal Brown volunteered and remained with the company commander. tinued on duty long after he had been mortally wounded, and was killed in action later in the day.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to auut, Mrs. M. Mosberg.

Sergeant, Company I, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

On two occasions he averted heavy casualties in his platoon by going forward and, single-handed, destroying machine-gun nests with hand grenades. At the time of his death he had brought his platoon to the farthest point of Private, Headquarters Company, 59th Infantry, 4th Division.

As a battalion runner, he repeatedly exposed himself to intense artillery and machine-gun fire, crossing open spaces in view of the enemy to deliver important messages. He aided largely in maintaining liaison and his courage was an inspiration to those near him.

Corporal, Company K, 313th Infantry, 79th Division.

He crawled ahead of his platoon and located and killed a sniper who had wounded him and several others. Although seriously wounded, he remained in command of his platoon until he was ordered to the rear, when he insisted on going back without assistance, though he was so weak he could hardly walk.

Sergeant, Company I, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
During an attack Sergeant Brown advanced with five other soldiers into the enemy's line, and although surrounded by six German machine guns, held his position until support reached him. Although badly gassed, he refused to be evacuated.

Private, Company D, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
When the first two battalions of his regiment had been surrounded by the enemy, Private Brown volunteered to accompany a patrol for the purpose of establishing liaison with the forward troops, knowing from the fate of previous patrols that the mission would probably prove fatal. In command of the 2d Battalion of his regiment and directed to take the town of Ville-devant-Chaumont he led his battalion in person, and by a process of slow infiltration successfully carried out his mission. His entire disregard for his own safety, his coolness under heavy enemy fire, and his gallant leadership proving an inspiration to his men, enabling them in the face of concentrated machine-gun fire to take the town, making possible the advance of the troops of his division on both sides.

Corporal, Company M, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.
He displayed exceptional bravery as a member of a patrol of six men which entered Bellean from the rear and captured four prisoners. He also worked untiringly in the evacuation of wounded at Torcy in the face of constant and intense shell fire. Later, when his platoon commander and most of the commissioned officers had been incapacitated, he took command of his platoon and skillfully led it in the advance, keeping his command together under heavy shell and machine-gun fire until he was struck four times.

First lieutenant, 302d Engineers, 77th Division.

He displayed remarkable bravery in reconnoitering sites for footbridges across the Meuse River and later directing the construction of these bridges under heavy machine-gun fire. While so engaged, he was killed by a sniper.

Second licutenant, observer, 50th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Licutenant Brown, observer, piloted by Licutenant Phillips, while on a reconnaissance for the 78th Division, attacked an enemy balloon and forced it to descend. They were in turn attacked by three enemy planes (Fokker type).

The incendiary bullets from the enemy's machine set the signal rockets in Lieutenant Brown's cockpit afire. Disregarding the flames, he continued to fire, destroying one enemy plane and forcing the others to retire. He then used the extinguisher handed him by his pilot and put out the flames. They successfully completed their mission and secured valuable information.

Captain, Medical Corps, attached to 361st Infantry, 91st Division.
Captain Brown voluntarily advanced in front of our lines for the purpose of rescuing the wounded left in advance of the new lines by the retirement of a unit of the regiment. Due to his efforts 14 wounded Americans were brought safely back to our lines.

Sergeant, Company E, 366th Infantry, 92d Division.
He was a member of a combat group which was attacked by 20 of an enemy raiding party, advancing under a heavy barrage and using liquid fire. The screent in charge of the group was killed and several others, including Sergeant Brown, were wounded. Nevertheless, this soldier, with three others, fearlessly resisted the enemy until they were driven off.

Private, first class, Company A, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
When the advance of his battalion was checked by heavy machine-gun fire, Private Brown, with two other soldiers, went forward under heavy fire to reconnoiter the enemy positions. By effective rifle fire they drove the gunners from two machine-gun nests into a dugout near by, which they captured, together with 35 prisoners, including 3 officers.

Second lieutenant, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.

Advancing with his platoon through heavy fog and dense smoke, and in the face of terrific fire, which inflicted heavy casualties on his forces, Lieutenant Brown reached the wire in front of the main Hindenburg line, and after reconnoitering for gaps, assaulted the position and effected a foothold. Having been reinforced by another platoon, he organized a small force, and by bombine and through fighting conjugated as the property of the second control ing and trench fighting captured over a hundred prisoners. Repeated attacks throughout the day were repelled by his small force. He also succeeded in taking four field pieces, a large number of machine guns, antitank rifles, and other military property, at the same time keeping in subjection the prisoners he had taken.

Sergeant, Company F, 322d Infantry, 81st Division.

After having been wounded in the afternoon of Nov. 9 he had his wound dressed and returned to his platoon through very heavy enemy artillery and machine gun fire. When his platoon was relieved, he returned to the former position through enemy artillery fire to the rescue of a wounded man and assisted him to the rescue. to the rear.

First sergeant, Company B, 60th Infantry, 5th Division. Seeing a comrade lying wounded and exposed to great danger of machine-gun and shell fire, Sergeant Brown went to his aid and, after rescuing him, carried him through the sweeping harrage to the first-aid station, a distance of onehalf a kilometer.

Exposing himself to the greatest danger, he constantly carried messages from the company to the platoons occupying the front lines. The journey necessitated his crossing an area swept by intense artillery and withering machine-gun fire, but he successfully maintained liaison during a very critical period of the attack. Private, Company K, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Andrew Brown.

Corporal, 101st Field Signal Battalion, 26th Division.
At a critical time when the need for a barrage was imperative and telephone communication impossible, he voluntarily carried a message to the artillery across an open field which was subjected to intense artillery, machine-gun, and rifle fire.

Bugler, machine gun company, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
Bugler Brown exposed himself to heavy fire while carrying numerous messages during the heavy artillery preparation preceding the last German offensive.
He was killed while acting as guide to a front-line platoon.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. S. J. Brown.

On the night of July 18-19 he made a personal reconnaissance ahead of his troops, through heavy flanking machine-gun fire. He pushed forward to the outpost lines through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire to keep in touch with all his platoon. On Oct. 3-4 he made a personal reconnaissance on the left flank of his division through heavy shell fire and continual sniping, and gained information which enabled him to well place his battalion and cover an exposed flank.

Second lieutenant, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
Despite the fact that he had been wounded Lieutenant Bruce continued in command of his machine-gun platoon, firing the gun himself when the crew was depleted, until he received a second wound.

Private, Company C, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

Private Bruce with three others advanced in front of our lines and silenced an enemy machine-gun post, killing the crew of four. The post was causing heavy casualties on the left flank of the company. On the following day with a comrade he advanced beyond the lines and silenced two machine guns, the latter operation he was wounded. forcing the crews to surrender. In the latter operation he was wounded.

Private, 81st Company, 6th Machine Gun Battalion, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

By effective use of an automatic rifle Private Brummett defended the left flank of his platoon, thereby preventing the enemy from reaching the rear of his lines. On several other occasions he volunteered and carried messages through terrific bombardment.

Private, Company D, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

Although surrounded on all sides by the enemy, and with his ammunition entirely exhausted, Private Brundrett offered a most stubborn resistance to the enemy's attack, fighting his way through their ranks with his rifle and bayonet to the support platoou, where he again took up the fight.

Private, first class, Company B, 149th Machine Gun Battalion, 42d Division. As platoon runner he showed marked heroism in volunteering for dangerous missions, repeatedly carrying important messages through zones swept by intense artillery and machine-gun fire. He remained on duty after being wounded and until his command was relieved.

Corporal, Company I, 56th Infantry, 7th Division.

As he was approaching the wounded man he was instantly killed by an enemy sniper. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, William H. Bryant.

Sergeant, Company D, 358th Infantry, 90th Division.
Sergeant Bryant, with four other men, volunteered to cross a valley to the woods opposite and silence machine guns which had held up the advance of his company. In the face of heavy enemy fire this small group accomplished its mission, thus enabling the company to cross the valley without further

First sergeant, Company D, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
Although wounded very severely in the knee by shrapnel, Sergeant Bryson remained in charge of his platoon for more than 24 hours, during a critical period of the operations. Due to his excellent example of courage, leadership, and skill in handling them, his platoon successfully repelled a number of enemy attacks during this period of time.

First lieutenant, 371st Infantry, 93d Division.

After being seriously wounded Lieutenant Bryson remained in command of his platoon, never hesitating in his attempts to gain his objective in the face of the greatest hazards.

Private, Company I, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.

Brigadier general, 2d Infantry Brigade, 1st Division.

Before and during the attack on Berzy-le-See, France, July 21, 1918, he displayed conspicuous gallattry and heroic leadership of his command. When most of the officers of his brigade had fallen, General Buck, with contempt of personal danger and in spite of heavy artillery bombardment and machine-gun fire, traversed the front of his advancing forces, gave correct directions to his organization commanders, and led the first wave of the culminating attack which stormed and cartinged the town. attack which stormed and captured the town.

Corporal, Company G, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
Corporal Buck advanced alone beyond the front lines, through a terrific barrage and in the face of unusually active machine-gun fire, to the rescue of a wounded comrade. While making his way through the wood he came upon two other members of the company whom he utilized as a patrol attacking and capturing an enemy machine-gun nest, together with six prisoners. He then went to the rescue of the wounded soldier, forcing the prisoners to carry the man to

Captain, 105th Infantry, 27th Division.
Commanding the 3d Battalion of his regiment, and having led them forward to a position covering the left flank of the division, he discovered a small unit of another battalion located in a shell hole some distance in advance of his position. Finding this unit entirely surrounded by the enemy and in imminent danger of total annihilation Captain Bulkley, though suffering from a severe head wound, rushed forward to their assistance, firing a Lewis gun, breaking the enemy's attack, and killing and wounding several of their machine gunners. This action was in full view of the enemy and performed with utter disregard of heavy enemy machine-gun and rifle fire, and served as an inspiration to the members of the American fighting forces engaged in that operation.

Private, first class, Company C, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.

Colonel, 56th Infantry, 7th Division.

While his regiment was being subjected to an intense enemy bombardment he visited every platoon in the front line and so encouraged and inspired his men by his bravery that they successfully met and repulsed every counterattack made upon them.

Captain, Medical Corps, attached to 168th Infantry, 42d Division.

During the advance of his regiment in the Verdun sector he established aid stations at points as far advanced as possible and supervised them throughout the combat, working continuously, tirelessly, and fearlessly without food or rest. On Oct. 14 this officer went out in advance of the front line to reconnoiter a site for an aid station and an ambulance route. Seeing a wounded officer lying about 300 meters from the enemy's line, he went to his rescue and carried him through terriffe machine-gun and rifle fire to a shell hole, where he administered aid, in entire disregard of his own safety.

Captain, 148th Infantry, 37th Division.

While in command of a combat liaison group operating between the 37th and valie in command of a compan parson group operating between the 37th and 91st Divisions, and under heavy hostile artillery fire, Captain Bunge, although painfully wounded by a shell fragment and burned with gas, courageously remained in command of his company, maintained contact with the enemy, and directed the company movements. When the attack was continued on Sept. 27 and his company was acting in the same capacity, while passing through a terrible hostile artillery barrage he received a serious fracture of the skull from enemy shell fragments, and refusing to be evacuated he tenaciously continued with his group. Later, on the same day, while leading his company, he was again seriously wounded by shell fire, which necessitated his evacuation.

Corporal, Company A, 113th Machine Gun Battalion, 30th Division. Though wounded soon after the opening of the attack, he continued to lead his squad until he was incapacitated by a second wound.

Private, first class, Company F, 310th Infantry, 78th Division.
Private Buonomo was voluntarily acting as guide on a reconnaissance with an officer, when the latter was severely wounded by a bursting shell. Having himself been struck by a shell fragment, he disregarded his own injuries, and immediately bandaged the officer's wound and assisted him to the dressing the state of maters away scross an open field swept by shell fire. He then station, 800 meters away, across an open field swept by shell fire. He then volunteered to return to division headquarters through intense artillery fire to report that the reconnaissance had not yet been completed.

Second lieutenant, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.

After his company had suffered severe casualties Lieutenant Burbank reorganized his company under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire. He then led his organization in the attack on Hill 190. He was the first to enter the enemy trenches and personally captured a machine gun, with its crew. Due to his gallantry, the objective was reached and held.

First lieutenant, 326th Infantry, 82d Division. While leading his men against determined enemy resistance, Lieutenant Burch while leading his men against determined enemy resistance, Lieutenant Burren was severely wounded in the arm by four machine-gun bullets. Although suffering intense pain, he continued to press on until ordered to the rear. On his way to the dressing station he endeavored to carry a more severely wounded officer, and, although greatly weakened, he struggled with his burden until the arrival of litter bearers.

Private, medical detachment, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

During the entire operation he repeatedly exposed himself to heavy enemy fire in order to dress and evacuate the wounded. On July 22 he went through a heavy enemy barrage to render first aid to the wounded in the front line and to evacuate them to the rear and was himself wounded while engaged in this work.

Private, first class, Battery C, 122d Field Artillery, 33d Division.
Though suffering from illness, he volunteered and performed valiant service as a telephone operator under heavy shell fire. Later he went out alone through shell fire to repair the telephone line, which had been broken in several places by shells.

Private, sanitary detachment, 326th Infantry, 82d Division. Under heavy machine-gun and shell fire, Private Burden crossed and recrossed the Aire River five times, administering first aid to 40 wounded soldiers until he collapsed from exhaustion.

Captain, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
Throughout five days of the most bitter fighting he displayed most exceptional valor and coolness in leading his men through intense machine-gun and barrage fire. He fell, seriously wounded, while at the head of his men.

Attacked by two Fokker biplanes, he outmaneuvered both machines, shot one into flames and routed the other one. Later, seeing three Fokkers attacking an American aviator, he at once dove into the combat to his assistance, shooting down one and driving off the other two. His quick and unhesitating attack, single-handed, on the three Fokkers saved the life of his fellow pilot.

First lieutenant, 362d Infantry, 91st Division.
On duty as battalion liaison officer, Lieutenant Burgard was establishing the battalion post of command at daybreak when he suddenly discovered a party of the enemy placing machine guns so as to fire upon the position from the flank. Firing a rifle to give the alarm, Lieutenant Burgard advanced toward the enemy, followed by the battalion headquarters group, whom he led in a vigorous attack on the hostile force, capturing 21 of the enemy, 1 machine gun, and 2 light machine rifles, with but 1 casualty among his own men.

Second lieutenant, observer, 3d Observation Group, Air Service.

He, with his pilot, flying at an altitude of less than 50 meters, within close range of numerous machine guns and light artillery pieces firing continually on them, staked the American advance lines and helped silence enemy machinegun nests which were holding up the advance of the Infantry at this point. For the following acts of extraordinary heroism in action in Europe this man was awarded an oak-leaf cluster: On the morning of Nov. 1, 1918, during the progress of an important attack, Lieutenant Burger volunteered on a mission to fly through a heavy fog in order to locate the then advanced infantry of the attack. In accomplishing this mission it was necessary to fly at a very low altitude and through the American barrage, which was being fired during the flight. He penetrated several kilometers into the enemy's-lines, being subjected to heavy machine-gun fire from the ground, which struck his plane many times, obtained information of the disposition of the enemy artillery, infantry, and our own front line. He returned through the fire with the information, which was the first authentic data to reach the division commander. commander.

First lieutenant, 15th Machine Gun Battalion, 5th Division. Sergeant, Company C, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
Assisted by another soldier, he voluntarily went to the aid of a comrade who was lying in front of his lines, in full view of the enemy. After administering firstaid, they succeeded in bringing the wounded man to safety.

Private, Company F, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.

Although suffering intense agony from severe wounds, he killed eight of the enemy with his rifle and bayonet, and then crawled about for two days before being picked up. He died shortly after from his wounds.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Jennie Douglas.

Private, Company E, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
He fearlessly sprang to the assistance of a French officer and helped him, under fire, removed a wounded French soldier from a burning tank which had been struck by a shell. Afterwards seeing a gap opening in the firing line, he collected four men, dashed forward and captured five machine guns, with which he held the line until the arrival of reinforcements. He then rejoined his platoon, where he rendered valuable service during the remainder of the battle.

Sergeant, first class, Company C, 107th Field Signal Battalion, 32d Division. He, in charge of a detachment, strung wire far in advance of the front lines, working through a heavy artillery fire to the point where the regimental post of command was to be situated, 100 yards from the enemy line. Here he was ordered to leave one man at the instrument. While the rest of the detachment returned to the rear he himself volunteered and remained alone in this detactors position. dangerous position.

Mechanic, Company A, 130th Infantry, 33d Division. As he was administering first aid to a wounded comrade during a raid, they were attacked by several of the enmey. Undaunted by this superior force, Mechanic Burr succeeded in killing four and driving off the others, thereby setting a conspicuous example of courage and coolness.

Private, Machine Gun Company, 371st Infantry, 930 Division. Private Burrell, although painfully wounded in the knee, refused to be evacu-ated, stating that if he went to the rear there would not be enough left for his group to function.

Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 118th Infantry, 30th Division. When his platoon commander was wounded and all the noncommissioned officers had become casualties, under a heavy enemy barrage which fell upon his company, killing or wounding more than a third of the men, Sergeant Burronghs reorganized the platoon under heavy shellfire, directed the evacutation of the wounded, and then led the one remaining gun team forward, displaying remarkable coolness and initiative.

First lieutenant, observer, balloon section, Air Service, 1st Army. On each of these occasions Lieutenant Burt remained with his balloon, making important observations of the enemy's positions and directing our artillery fire until his balloon was set on fire by incendiary bullets from enemy aircraft. On one occasion he refused to jump until his companion, a student observer, was safely away.

Colonel, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.

Colonel, 30th Inlantry, 3a Division.

On repeated occasions during the intense enemy bombardment preceding the second battle of the Marne and on the following day Colonel Butts went to exposed positions under heavy shellfire for the purpose of making personal reconnaissances, securing information of great value. The personal courage and determination displayed by him inspired his regiment to withstand successfully the principal shock of the German attack and drive the enemy back across the Marne by the brilliant counterattacks which he planned.

Second lieutenant, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.

Upon his own initiative Lieutenant Byam moved his machine-gun platoon through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire 400 meters in advance of the front line, and from there opened fire on the enemy, who was holding up our advance, displaying exceptional bravery in holding this position against several hostile attacks. Captain, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

When his company met with enemy machine-gun fire of such intensity that the success of the operation was threatened Captain Caldwell, disregarding personal danger, walked up and down the front line, designating targets to his men and encouraging them. He then led an automatic-rifle squad, proceeding 200 yards ahead of the line, and captured an enemy machine gun.

Private, Company G, 28th Infantry, 1st Division. In order to stop artillery fire, which was causing heavy losses in our ranks, he, with another soldier, rushed 300 yards to the front, attacked a machine-gun strong point and a 77-millimeter artillery gun, captured the position and the gun, killed 2, and captured 13 of the enemy.

Sergeant, medical detachment, 76th Field Artillery, 3d Division. Although suffering from a severe gassing, received after his mask had been shot away by a fragment of a shell, he continued through the heavy shelling to administer aid to the wounded.

Private, Company B, 3d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division. He distinguished hinself near Soissons, France, by exceptional coolness and heroic handling of his gun. While under intense fire he inflicted heavy casualties on the enemy, thereby materially aiding the advance, and was killed on July 19, 1918, while seeking an advantageous position during the advance of that date.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Sallie Calhoun.

Sergeant, Company E, 308th Infantry, 77th Division. In order to clean out an enemy machine-gun nest which was holding up the adorder to the out air elemy machine-gui ness which was holding up the averance of his company, Sergeant Callahan volunteered and, with an officer, crawled through the enemy wire into his lines, killed two of the enemy, and, although their position was discovered and the area was swept by machine gun fire, he remained with the officer, killed an enemy machine gunner, and drove another away with his gun, and finally returned with information concerning the organy positions. cerning the enemy positions.

Private, Company A, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
While on duty as a company runner he carried a message through two barrages to regimental commanders. By his act many casualties were avoided.

Major, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
While leading his battalion into advanced positions, Major Callen made a personal reconnaissance of the territory ahead of his troops in order to locate strongly held machine-gun nests which were holding up the advance of his battalion. On several occasions he personally superintended the cleaning battalion. On several occasions he personally superintended the cleaning out of machine-gun nests. Throughout the engagement he was subjected to continuous machine gun, sniper, trench mortar, and artillery fire, but continued his work, setting an excellent example of courage and bravery.

Private, Headquarters Company, 58th Infantry, 4th Division.
Facing heavy fire, he carried ammunition from regimental headquarters to the companies of the assaulting battalion, returning with prisoners. In a later engagement he carried and laid wire while under heavy fire from snipers, engagement he carried and laid wire while under heavy hie from sinjers, machine guns, and artillery, thus maintaining telephonic communication with the front-line companies. Subsequently, while endeavoring to establish telephonic communications, he was killed while carrying wire across ground swept by machine guns and artillery.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Constant Callewaert.

Captain, 12th Field Artillery, 2d Division.
With utter disregard for personal danger, he passed for 200 yards under intense artillery and machine-gun fire to rescue a wounded officer. Finding the wounded officer could only be moved on a stretcher, he placed him in a shell hole and started back for one. He was severely wounded in the head, falling unconscious. Recovering a half hour later, he tried to go back to rescue the wounded officer, but again fell senseless.

Private, Company M, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.

After seeing several other runners fail in the attempt to get through the barrage, Private Camell volunteered and carried a message through the violent barrage to his battalion commander. During the entire action of Oct. 6-13 he performed most valiant service in maintaining liaison between his company and battalion headquarters.

Private, first class, Company B, 3d Machine Gun Battallon, 1st Division. When the Infantry of which he was a part was held up by a trench occupied by Germans near Soissons, France, July 19, 1918, he voluntarily ran around the trench to its rear, shot and killed one of the enemy, and captured the remainder.

Sergeant, Company I, 309th Infantry, 78th Division.

A shell landed in an observation post occupied by Sergeant Campbell and two other soldiers, seriously wounding all three. Though be himself had been struck in seven places, this soldier placed both his companions under shelter and then walked through the barrage to company headquarters, where he sent stretcher bearers to the assistance of his wounded comrades, before securing first aid for himself.

First lieutenant, 94th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

He attacked an enemy biplane at an altitude of 4,500 meters, east of Flirey, France. He rushed to the attack, but after shooting a few rounds his gun jammed. Undeterred by this accident, he maneuvered so as to protect himself, corrected the jam in midair, and returned to the assault. After a short, violent action, the enemy plane took fire and crashed to the earth.

Oak-leaf clusters (4).
One bronze oak leaf is awarded to Lieutenant Campbell for each of the following acts of extraordinary heroism in action: On May 27, 1918, he encountered three enemy monoplanes at an altitude of 3,000 meters over Montsec, France. Despite the superior strength of the enemy, he promptly attacked, and fighting a brilliant battle, shot down one German machine, which fell in three pieces, and drove the other two well within the enemy lines. On May 28, 1918, he saw six German Albatross aeroplanes flying toward him at an altitude of 2,000 meters, near Bois Rata, France. Regardless of personal danger, he immediately attacked, and by skillful maneuvering and accurate operation immediately attacked, and by skillful maneuvering and accurate operation of his machine gun he brought one plane down in flames and drove the other five back into their own lines. On May 13, 1918, he took the offensive against two German pianes at an altitude of 2,500 meters over Lironville, France, shot down one of them, and pursued the other far behind the German lines. On June 5, 1918, accompanied by another pilot, he attacked two enemy battle planes at an altitude of 5,700 meters over Epley, France. After a spirited combat he was shot through the back by a machine-gun bullet, but in spite of his injury he kept on fighting until he had forced one of the enemy planes to the ground, where it was destroyed by crillery fire, and bed diver planes to the ground, where it was destroyed by artillery fire, and had driven the other plane back into its own territory.

Captain, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.

He displayed exceptional bravery when with three men he preceded his battalion into le Jolie Bois and captured three machine guns and 20 prisoners which had been maintaining a heavy fire upon our lines.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Annie Campbell.

Sergeant, Company A, 7th Engineers, 5th Division. Sergeant Campbell, on patrol with two other soldiers, captured a machine gun and 13 prisoners, killing two others who tried to escape.

Private, first class, Company K, 311th Infantry, 78th Division. After all the regular company runners had become casualties, Private Campbell volunteered as a runner, carrying a call for reinforcements through the enemy barrage and guiding the reinforcing troops back to his company. He then aided in first aid work until his company was relieved.

Second lieutenant, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
While in an advanced position flanked by machine guns and under heavy artillery fire, he carried a message to regimental headquarters by the shortest and most direct route through woods occupied by the enemy.

Band sergeant, Headquarters Company, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
Sergeant Campbell frequently requested and was granted permission to render aid to the wounded. Making his way into an open field swept by a withering nachine-gun fire, he rendered first aid to many of the wounded. While performing this highly meritorious work he himself was wounded by grenade

First lieutenant, 368th Infantry, 92d Division.
In the afternoon of Sept. 27, 1918, Lieutenant Campbell saw a runner fall wounded in the middle of a field swept by heavy machine-gun fire. At imminent peril to his own life, and in full view of the enemy, he crossed the field and carried the wounded soldier to shelter.

Sergeant, 43d Company, 5th Regiment, United States Marine Corps, 2d Division. on the 3d and 4th of October, while detailed on statistical work, he voluntarily assisted in giving first aid to the wounded. On Oct. 5, when the enemy advanced within 300 yards of the dressing station, he took np a position in the lines helping in defense. Although twice wounded, he remained in action under heavy fire until the enemy had been repulsed.

Sergeant, Company B, 59th Infantry, 4th Division. He made his way forward, in the face of annihilating fire, to the aid of a wounded comrade who was lying exposed to this great hazard and earried him across an open field to safety.

Corporal, Company D, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
Having been separated from their company in a smoke barrage, Corporal Cardwell and Private Carl Lee found themselves face to face with a party of the enemy. Private Lee brought his automatic rifle to his shoulder and attempted to fire, but the gun was jammed and would not shoot. Seeing themselves covered by the gun and not knowing its condition, the Germans threw up their hands, and while Private Lee kept the rifle at his shoulder Corporal Cardwell rounded up the Germans and disarmed them. Their ruse resulted in the capture of 12 of the enemy, comprising three machine-gun crews erews

First lieutenant, 58th Infantry, 4th Division.

After his company had failed in an attack on Hill 208 with the loss of 2 officers and 65 men, Lieutenant Cardwell reorganized the remaining men of his organization and personally led them in a second attack on the same objective. The advance was made in the face of heavy machine-gun and trench mortar fire, but due to the example and individual bravery of Lieutenant Cardwell, objective was taken and held.

Corporal, Company H, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.

For repeated acts of extraordinary heroism in action near Cierges, France, and near Gesnes, France. During an attack near Cierges, Private Carlson, assisted by 2 comrades, repeatedly exposed himself to enemy machine-gun and artillery fire in order to assist the wounded to the first-aid station. On Oct. 14, in the Meuse-Argonne offensive, when the advance of his company was held up by enemy machine-gun fire, he advanced in attacking a machine-gun nest until all the members of the squad were killed except himself. He then pushed on alone and killed one of the enemy. His rifle became jammed and useless, he continued to advance and succeeded in capturing the two guns, together with the crew, consisting of 8 men. together with the crew, consisting of 8 men.

He advanced with his nien for 400 yards across a field heavily swept by machine-gun fire to a railroad embankment and held the position for more than an hour; reinforcements were prevented from reaching him by the intense fire. By his courage and determination in maintaining this position, he protected the flank of his battalion and made possible its further advance. On Oct. 17, near La Selle River, this officer was knocked down and wounded by a bursting shell; when he recovered he moved forward with his platoon until weakness compelled his evacuation.

Private, Company M, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.
Although the bridge crossing the Vesle was being heavily shelled and many men were killed in attempting to cross it, Private Carnahan made repeated trips, each time carrying a badly wounded man. He was finally wounded, but refused evacuation, volunteering for duty the following day and providing medical attention for his wounded comrades by venturing across the bridge through the murderous fire.

Corporal, Company F, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

Although wounded, Corporal Carner refused to be evacuated and continued to lead his squad forward. Finding another squad without a leader, he combined it with his own, led them both to the attack under heavy fire, and succeeded in driving the enemy from a strong position. His action enabled his company to advance to its objective.

Corporal, Machine Gun Company, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

After his platoon commander and platoon sergeant had both been wounded, he took command of the platoon, reorganized it under heavy fire, and successfully led the attack of his platoon on all objectives. This noncommissioned officer had previously performed gallant service while commanding a machine-gun section during a heavy enemy bombardment at Cantigny, France, May 28, 1918.

Corporal, Company C, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.
While advancing with his platoon in the Argonne Forest, Corporal Carpenter located a machine-gun sniper who was directing fire on his squad. Ordering his men to take cover, he drew the sniper's attention to himself by fire from his rifle. His gallant efforts prevented heavy casualties among his squad, but he himself was killed.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Mary Carpenter.

Private, Company H, 47th Infantry, 4th Division.

He responded to a call for volunteers to destroy a hostile machine gun, approach to which was covered by fire from three other machine guns. seven other soldiers he went forward and skillfully and boldly accomplished the mission. This courageous soldier has since been killed in action. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Mrs. Lena Woods.

First lieutenant, chaplain, 166th Infantry, 42d Division. Volunteering for the service, he accompanied a patrol as interpreter and later, when our troops encountered stubborn resistance and sustained beavy casualties, he established a dressing station and, under heavy shell fire, administered to the wounded and dying, continuing this service after he himself had been wounded twice.

Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.

While leading his section in an assault upon a hostile machine-gun nest Sergeant Carr fell mortally wounded, but he inspired his men by urging them on and giving detailed instructions to the soldier whom he placed in command to succeed himself.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Audrew J. Carr.

Captain, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.

Preparatory to an attack upon Vaux, and in broad daylight, he voluntarily crawled out into no man's land to a point close to the enemy lines, remaining there several hours, under fire from machine guns and snipers, while he made sketches of the town and its defenses. The information he obtained was of the utmost importance in planning the attack, which was made the following day with marked success

First lieutenant, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.

While on his way to investigate the situation on the flank of his battalion, he received word that the flank company was hard pressed and without officers. He fearlessly made his way across an open field swept by continuous machinegun fire, and although four guides were hit and his own clothing pierced, reached the company and saved the situation.

First lieutenant, 142d Infantry, 36th Division.

After he had led his men through the wire and obtained cover, Lieutenant Carrigan saw one of his men wounded and entangled in the wire. He left cover under heavy fire to bring this man to safety. As he was helping him out of the wire he was shot in the neck by a machine-gun bullet. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, A. H. Carrigan.

Private, first class, Company D, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

While his platoon was being seriously menaced by hostile machine-gun fire Private Carrole, the only surviyor of his squad, crawled forward, and with his rifle killed two gunners and captured the remaining six men. His act enabled the further advance of his platoon.

Corporal, Company E, 52d Infantry, 6th Division.

Although badly wounded, he continued in action against an attempted raid by the enemy until he was blinded by the explosion of a hand grenade. His determination was evidenced by the remark, "I can't see, you give it to them," which he made when passing his rifle to a sergeant of his company.

First lieutenant, 364th Infantry, 91st Division.

Although wounded in the arm in the attack of Sept. 26, Lieutenant Carroll gallantly led his platoon forward, under beavy artillery and machine-gun fire, through the Bois-de-Cheppy. Later, while leading his platoon in an attack near Neuve Grange Farm, he continued on until severely wounded a second time.

Corporal, Machine Gun Company, 326th Infantry, 82d Division.
Seeing an officer lying wounded and unable to return, Corporal Carroll went forth in full view of the enemy and, under terrific machine-gun and shell fire, assisted the officer to safety. He returned to his post and helped in the operation of his gun until ordered to withdraw.

First lieutenant, 2d Balloon Squadron, Air Service.
Lieutenant Carroll had ascended in a balloon to a height of I kilometer on a reglage mission when he was attacked by enemy planes, but he refused to leave his post, and fired on the planes with his pistol while incendiary bullets were striking his basket and balloon. He was finally forced to jump when his believe that the consequence are well of the product balloon burst into flames, but he reascended as soon as a new balloon could be inflated. On three other occasions he also gave proof of exceptional courage by remaining in his balloon in the face of aeroplane attacks, jumping only when his balloon took fire, and immediately reascending when a new balloon could be inflated.

Corporal, Company F, 306th Infantry, 77th Division.
Corporal Carroll led a patrol of 5 men to the rescue of his company commander, who was lying concealed within 20 yards of an enemy machine-gun nest. He advanced through the intense machine-gun fire to the enemy's position and, although wounded in 9 places, returned to our lines with important informa-

Sergeant, Company G, 26th Infantry, 1st Division. His platoon having been held up by machine-gun fire from an enemy dugout near Soissons, France, July 19, 1918, he crawled to the door of the dugout, killed the crew, and captured the gun.

Corporal, Company F, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
While a member of a patrol which was rushed by a greatly superior hostile patrol, he opened fire on the enemy at 15 yards, and although severely wounded displayed marked courage in covering the retirement of his patrol.

Private, first class, Company D, 312th Infantry, 78th Division. Accompanying a patrol, Private Carroll voluntarily advanced, in the face of annihilating machine-gun fire, in attacking a machine-gun nest which was halting the progress of his platoon. He forced the enemy to retreat and then captured the gun.

Corporal, Company A, 301st Battalion, Tank Corps.

Corporal Carroll was a gunner in a tank which was struck 4 times by shells, which killed or wounded the entire crew. Disregarding his own wounds in the back and leg, he walked 3 miles to secure assistance, guided stretcher bearers back to the disabled tank, and assisted in evacuating the wounded until he was completely exhausted.

Captain, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.
Captain Carroll, with a sergeant of his company, outflanked a machine-gun nest which was holding up their advance, shot one German noncommissioned officer who tried to escape, and captured two prisoners, the other occupants fleeing. The reduction of this machine-gun nest made it possible for the flank of the battalion to advance.

Mechanic, Machine Gun Company, 322d Infantry, 81st Division. Although suffering acutely from a wound, he continued with the advance, and after setting up his gun, preparing to open fire, he received a second wound, which caused his death.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Eva S. Carson.

Sergeant, Company D, 358th Infantry, 90th Division.

Sergeant Carson, with two other men, volunteered to rush an enemy machine gun which had concentrated its fire on an opening in some barbed-wire entanglement through which his company was endeavoring to advance. He had successfully silenced its fire when he was killed by the fire of other enemy machine guns.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Ruth V. Brown Carson.

Private, Company L, 111th Infantry, 28th Division. After a runner had been killed trying to carry a message from Fismette to Fismes, Private Carson volunteered and successfully delivered a duplicate message over the same route through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire.

Private, Company II, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
Wounded in the hand, he continued in the advance, operating his Lewis gun effectively. He aided in the capture of two enemy machine-gun posts, inspiring those serving with him by his personal fortitude. He was killed later in performance of duty.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Lewis Carter.

Sergeant, Company A, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.

Sergeant Carter fearlessly led his platoon in an attack until shot down by machine-gun bullet, after which he rose to his feet and urged his men forward and then fell dead.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to half brother, Russell K. Price.

Private, Company C, 56th Infantry, 7th Division. As a battalion runner he worked unceasingly, without regard for personal safety, carrying messages night and day under fire from enemy artillery and machine guns.

Private, Company H, 38th Infantry, 3d Division. He held a post where the Germans made repeated attempts to cross the River Marne in boats. He continued to fire his automatic rifle into the boatloads of Germans after being wounded.

Sergeant, Company I, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
When his company was halted by machine-gun fire which threatened to wipe out the entire company, Sergeant Carter led a patrol and charged the nest, and was successful not only in cleaning out the stronghold but in enabling his company to command a more favorable position.

Second lieutenant, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.

Advancing against greatly superior numbers of the enemy, Lieutenant Carter was painfully wounded. He refused evacuation until his objective was reached, and during the combat captured or killed more than 60 of the enemy.

First lieutenant, 326th Infantry, 82d Division.
Leading two platoons across the Aire River, Lieutenant Carter brought his command to the aid of an assault company which had been stopped by withering enemy fire. As senior officer with the troops who had crossed the river he constantly exposed himself in organizing units and directing fire. He continued in action after being wounded, being evacuated only after he had dropped from exhaustion and after he had rescued three wounded enlisted men and one officer.

Second lieutenant, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.

When all the men in his platoon had become casualties he operated the one remaining machine gun with the aid of two volunteers from a line company. Even after he himself had been severely wounded, he remained at his post until the Infantry, having effected a crossing of the Ourcq, were firmly established. Refusing assistance to the dressing station, he tried to crawl back, but dropped exhausted.

Private, first class, sanitary detachment, 115th Infantry, 29th Division. Private, first class, sanitary detachment. High infantry, 29th Division.

On Oct. 11 he dressed and treated wounded men on the front line under shellfire continuously for two hours. On Oct. 16 he carried a wounded officer on his back under shellfire to the first-aid station. On Oct. 17 he directed litter bearers to the front line and helped to evacuate the wounded. All during the drive he went back and forth to the dressing station for bandages and medicine for the wounded. Daily during the attacks he would search the woods for wounded men.

Private, 96th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. After having been wounded in the capture of Bouresches, France, on June 6, 1918, he displayed remarkable energy and courage in fearlessly attacking superior numbers of the enemy and materially aiding in their defeat.

Private, medical detachment, 118th Infantry, 30th Division. Private Carter displayed notable bravery in administering aid to wounded men and carrying them to the aid station under heavy fire. He also assisted in maintaining liaison to the flanks and rear of his company under continuous fire, volunteering and carrying a message under especially hazardous conditions and during an enemy counterattack. During this engagement Private Carter was wounded, but he declined to leave his post until ordered to do so by an officer.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 361st Infantry, 91st Division. While attached to the signal section of the attacking battalion, he repeatedly spliced telephone wires in the midst of heavy artillery and machine-gun fire during the attack, displaying at all times exceptional coolness and personal bravery and aiding materially in maintaining communication between battalion and regimental command posts.

Second lieutenant, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
Rendered helpless by the explosion of a gas shell, he refused evacuation, but after regaining consciousness returned to his command and was instrumental in repulsing a strong enemy counterattack.

Second lieutenant, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.

Commanding a platoon of Stokes mortars, he showed marked bravery and leadership, capturing many prisoners and directing the organization of captured positions with utter disregard of his personal danger. On Sept. 14 he directed the operations of his mortars under an intense artillery and machinegun fire, until the last one was smashed by shell fire, and having been twice wounded and unable to continue forward, he called his section leaders and ordered them to continue the advance with the Infantry before he would allow himself to he taken to the rear

Second lieutenant, 9th Infantry, 2d Division. Lieutenant Carter showed extraordinary heroism when he led his company through an intense machine-gun and artillery fire against superior numbers. Private, Company F, 311th Infantry, 78th Division.
While the advance of his company was being held up by hostile machine-gun fire, he worked his way around the enemy's flank, and although exposed to sniper fire he charged the nest and by the effective use of his Chaucat rifle captured that nest and the one on the right. His action made possible the further advance of his company and the capture of 47 more prisoners.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 12th Field Artillery, 2d Division. He displayed conspicuous courage and gallantry under fire by organizing a detachment, leading it out in front of our line under heavy fire, and bringing back the body of an officer who had been killed by a sniper.

Private, Company I, 102d Infantry, 26th Division. During the operations in the Belieu Bois, he went forward at the risk of personal danger, and succeeded in rescuing a wounded comrade and brought him back to safety, being subject the whole journey to intense and deadly artillery and machine-gun fire.

Private, Company K, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
When Infantry advance had been held up by machine-gun fire, the strength of which could not be determined, Private Carty and another soldier scouted far beyond their lines into enemy territory, and, after cutting telephone cables, crept up on the nests from the rear. The entire personnel of the guns, consisting of 1 officer and 39 men, was taken prisoner by Private Carty, after which he marched them into our lines.

succeeded in bandaging and earrying back to our lines many wounded

Corporal, Company F, 130th Infantry, 33d Division. Although wounded early in the attack, he continued to lead his squad to its objective and refused to leave the field until ordered to do so by an officer.

Captain, 168th Infantry, 42d Division.

He displayed notable gallantry on Mar. 9, 1918, in leading a command of untried men in company with French troops in a successful raid on enemy trenches in the Salient-du-Feys, France. By his heroic conduct he inspired both his own men and the men of our ally participating in the operation.

Sergeant, Company G, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.

Although he had been mortally wounded by enemy shellfire, which caused heavy casualties in his platoon, sergeant Casey reorganized the platoon and directed the placing of ontposts so that the position could be held, retusing to have his own wounds dressed until the other wounded men were evacuated. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Margaret Casey.

Sergeant, 49th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Although wounded during a counterattack he remained with his group, refusing to go to the rear or to accept medical attention until assured that the enemy had retired and that his men were properly dug in.

Corporal, Company I, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

After seeing 3 runners shot down while trying to cross an open field through violent machine-gun fire, to establish liaison with a regiment 500 yards away on his left, Corporal Casey undertook the same mission and successfully accomplished it.

Sergeant, Company F, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.

Leading his platoon under a heavy machine-gun barrage and through the fire of snipers from trees, he attacked 2 German machine-gun nests, captured their guns, and killed their erews. Sergeant Casey then saw 3 Germans crawling toward his men to open fire on them. He dashed forward, attacked them single-handed, and killed them all.

Oak-leaf cluster.

This man was awarded an oak-leaf cluster for extraordinary heroism at Belieu Bois, north of Verdun, France, Oct. 25, 1918. While leading his patrol in advance of our lines Sergeant Casey, encountering an enemy machine-gun nest, rushed in advance of his patrol and captured the position.

Private, Company D, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.
While engaged as scout he put to flight an enemy machine-gun crew unaided and maintained his distance ahead of his company in the face of flanking machine-gun fire which had prevented others from gaining ground.

Sergeant, Company M, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.
With utter disregard for his own safety, Sergeant Cassidy voluntarily left shelter and, going 100 yards in advance of the line under heavy machine-gun and shell fire, rescued a wounded officer.

First lieutenant, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
After his battalion commander had been killed and he himself so severely wounded that he was unable to walk without assistance, Lieutenant Cassidy (then battalion adjutant) remained on duty for 3 days, despite the fact that he had been ordered to the rear, and assisted the new battalion commander in re-forming the battalion. His remarkable fortitude and courage furnished an inspiration to the members of the battalion and aided materially in the attack.

Sergeant, Battery C, 124th Field Artillery, 33d Division. After 3 members of his gun crew had been wounded during heavy enemy shell fire he alone continued to keep his gun in action. Later, after reorganizing his section, he administered first-aid treatment to the wounded men.

Private, first class, Company C, 111th Machine Gun Battalion, 29th Division. In spite of being very ill and near exhaustion, with his gun crew under almost continuous shell fire for more than 24 hours, he remained, directing and encouraging the men of his depleted squad. He was killed by shell fire while he was faithfully engaged in keeping his machine gun in action. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Joseph J. Cassidy.

Private, Company M, 358th Infantry, 90th Division.
During the attack of his company between Fey-en-Haye and Vilcey on Sept.
12 Private Cassingham became separated from his company but continued to advance alone. He entered an enemy dugout and, single-handed, captured 13 prisoners, including 1 German major.

First lieutenant, 13th Cavalry, U. S. Army.

On Mar. 9, 1916, during the attack on the town of Columbus, N. Mex., by Mexicans under Villa, Lieutenant Castleman, by his gallant conduct and the successful and effective disposition of his troops in defense, saved the lives of many civilians and prevented the loss of much property in the town.

First lieutenant, 99th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

In spite of being attacked by 7 enemy planes (type Fokker) and later by 5 (type Pfalz), Lieutenant Castleman successfully accomplished a photographic mission 6 kilometers behind the German lines, without protection, and also destroyed 2 of the enemy planes.

Private, first class, Company K, 311th Infantry, 78th Division.

Despite the fact that the remainder of his company had been forced to evacuate a height, Private Castleman remained at his post and by exceptional handling of his automatic rifle stopped an enemy advance and made it possible for his company to again occupy the position.

Sergeant, Company C, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.

Sergeant, Company C, 125th Infantry, 32d Division. For repeated acts of extraordinary heroism in action at Cierges and Mont St. Martin, northeast of Chateau-Thierry, France. During the attack on Cierges Sergeant Castrua took command of his platoon when the commanding officer had been evacuated and led it successfully through the barrage to its objective. On Aug. 3, when 1 of his men had been left wounded on the field and no first-aid men were present, this soldier dashed through a terrific barrage and carried the wounded man to shelter.

Corporal, Company M, 105th Infantry, 27th Division.

He braved the perils of exacting machine-gun fire when he ventured out to rescue a wounded comrade. He completed this mission and returned for another comrade, who was lying wounded still farther forward. He also successfully brought this man to safety. That evening he led a detail through the munderous fire to replenish the supply of hand grenades. While returning to the lines he was seriously wounded when the box which he was carrying exploded.

Corporal, Company C, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.

As a member of a small patrol, Corporal Catalano crossed the Vesle River to reconnoiter the enemy's position. The patrol, having accomplished its mission, was attacked by the enemy and subjected to heavy machine-gun fire. In covering the withdrawal Corporal Catalano attacked, single-handed, and drove off 6 of the enemy. By his deed he enabled the others to return to our lines with the valuable information obtained. In the encounter he was severely wounded in the throat.

First lieutenant, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. While advancing with his company on the town of Bouresches their progress was greatly hindered by withering machine-gun and artillery fire of the enemy, which caused many casualties, one of whom was his commanding officer. Taking command, Lieutenant Cates led them on to the objective, despite the fact that he was rendered temporarily unconscious by a bullet striking his helmet and that this was his first engagement. Exposing himself to the extreme bazard, he reorganized his position with but a handful of men. Oak-leaf cluster.

Oak-lear cluster.

For the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near Boia-de-Belleau, France, June 13-14, 1918, Lieutenant Cates is awarded an oak-leaf cluster, to be worn with the distinguished-service cross: During the night a severe gas attack made it necessary to evacuate practically the entire personnel of 2 companies, including officers. Lieutenant Cates, suffering painfully from wounds, refused evacuation, remaining and rendering valuable assistance to another company.

Major, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.

Finding 2 companies of another battalion badly disorganized, he effected a reorganization and ordered them to advance, personally assuming command of these troops, of his own battalion, which had been in support, and of another battalion. He conducted the successful attack on Cote Dame Marie, exhibiting extraordinary initiative and bravery and showing utter disregard of his own personal danger.

Private, first class, Company L, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

All wire communications between Company L and battalion headquarters having been destroyed by shell fire, Private Cathcart voluntarily and with naving been destroyed by shell the, Fivate Catheart voluntarily and with utter disregard for his personal safety carried an important message to his battalion command through terrific machine-gun and artillery fire and under observation of the enemy. His hazardous mission successfully accomplished, he returned through terrific machine-gun fire to his company, his conduct having been a splendid example of bravery and devotion to the men of his company.

Second licutenant, 26th Infantry, 1st Division. During a strong enemy attack Licutenant Cather mounted the parapet of his trench, and, although exposed to withering machine-gun fire, he so skillfully directed the fire of his automatic rifles that the attack was repulsed. In this action he fell mortally wounded.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Grosvenor P. Cather.

First lieutenant, 30th Infantry, 3d Division. Although severely wounded while advancing with his company and assisting in taking enemy trenches, he returned to the post of command through heavy machine-gun and shell fire with valuable information of the troops in the line.

Private, Company I, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.

With another soldier, Private Caulder crawled through intense artillery and machine-gun fire, 50 yards in advance of their platoon, for the purpose of sniping the enemy machine gunners who were holding up the platoon. His companion was killed, but Private Caulder remained at his post and kept up an effective rifle fire on the enemy nest until the tanks came up and destroyed it.

Private, Company I, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.

He was acting as ammunition carrier for a machine gun which was supporting a raid on the enemy by the Infantry. While this gun was being operated from a shell hole its ammunition became exhausted, and the corporal called back to the carriers, who were in shell holes 25 yards behind, to bring up more ammunition. Though the gun position was under heavy enemyfire, Private Causland called out, "I'll take it," and rushed forward with two boxes of ammunition. Just as he reached the emplacement with the ammunition he was killed instantly by a machine-gun bullet.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Frank Causland.

Corporal, Company D, 102d Engineers, 27th Division. After several runners, sent back through a heavy barrage for reinforcements and ammunition, had failed to return, Corporal Cavanaugh, who was on duty with the Infantry, volunteered for this mission and successfully accomplished it.

Corporal, Company I., 18th Infantry, 1st Division.

After all the officers of the company had become casualties, Corporal Cavanaugh took command of and reorganized the company under heavy fire and led it in the attack on Hill 240. It was due to his courage and initiative that his company reached all objectives.

Sergeant, Company D, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.

After he had been wounded by shrapnel he refused to go to the rear, but directed the operations of his platoon in resisting enemy attacks for an hour and a half, when he finally collapsed. The following day he returned and unhesitatingly selected a position of great danger to himself in order to direct machine-gun fire upon enemy snipers. By his courageous exposure he thus made possible the evacuation of 25 wounded men across an exposed area and ever the Veloc Pierre. over the Vesle River.

Colonel, 363d Infantry, 91st Division.

During the entire operations of the Argonne-Meuse offensive Colonel Cavenaugh personally commanded his regiment after all the officers of his staff had been evacuated because of sickness or wounds. He continually exposed himself to terrific enemy fire while leading and organizing broken units and making reconnaissances of the front lines. On Sept. 26 he personally led his command out of Cheppy Woods and thereafter kept his post of command in close contact with his fighting units.

Sergeant, Company B, 354th Infantry, 89th Division. After his platoon commander had been wounded Sergeant Cavenee took command of his platoon, which was under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, and by the force of his own example of bravery led his men in an attack, successfully overcoming the enemy's resistance in spite of unfavorable odds.

Private, Company B, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
During the intense enemy artillery preparation just prior to the German offensive of July 15, 1918, he voluntarily made several trips through the heaviest shelling to bring wounded comrades from the field.

Sergeant, first class, Company A, 110th Engineers, 35th Division. While a member of a platoon of wire cutters he, with the assistance of a comrade, attacked and eaptured an enemy machine-gun nest that was holding up the advance. One officer, six men, and two guns were taken in the face of intense machine-gun fire.

Private, Company G, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
While his company was being held up by machine-gun fire, he crawled to a point within 10 yards of the nest and bombed out the enemy, where they came under fire from our guns and were killed. During the exploit Private Cecilia was wounded by enemy bombs.

Corporal, Company A, 108th Infantry, 27th Division. After the other members of his automatic-rifle squad had been killed or wounded in an assault against an enemy machine-gun nest, Corporal Cellar operated his gun alone, holding the fire of the machine gun until reenforcements arrived and put it out of action. His great courage and gallantry set an inspiring example to all his courades.

Sergeant, Company II, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.

On Oct. 4, 1918, Sergeant Cerbin led a small group through heavy fire and captured an enemy machine-gun nest with its crew of 6 men. The following day he again assisted in the capture of a machine-gun nest. Sergeant Cerbin later, after all officers had become casualties, took command of the company and led it forward to its objective.

Private, Company C, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

Private Cepaglia was on duty as a battalion runner during the period of 6 days in which his own and another battalion were surrounded by the enemy in the Argonne Forest, France, and cut off from communication with friendly troops. Although he was without food and toward the end of the period almost exhausted, this soldier carried messages to all parts of the position. Constantly under heavy fire from machine guns and trench mortars, he showed an utter disregard for his own personal safety.

Captain, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.

Although wounded while placing his machine guns in position preparatory to an attack, he remained on duty for several hours, constantly exposing himself to enemy fire as he moved along the front line to encourage his men. He remained on duty until exhausted from loss of blood Corporal, Company I, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.

While delivering a message, he was severely wounded by the explosion of a shell, but continued with his mission and returned with an answer before reporting for treatment.

Private, first class, Company B, 116th Infantry, 29th Division. Private Chamberlain went through an open country under heavy machine-gun fire to ascertain whether friendly troops were ahead of his regiment, after unknown soldiers had been observed; he was urged by the French troops on the flank not to make the return trip, as certain death seemed sure to be the outcome, but without hesitation, returned with information which resulted in the wounding of 1 of the enemy, the killing of 2, and the capture of 27 including 1 of 600. of 37, including 1 officer.

Private, first class, Company A, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

Although twice wounded by machine-gun fire, he continued on in the assault wave and assisted in driving the enemy from their positions. The courage of this noncommissioned officer was a material factor in the capture of number of prisoners.

Chamberlin was severely wounded in the right hand, this wound rendering his entire right arm useless. Despite his weakness from loss of blood, he refused to be evacuated until forced to do so.

Major, 135th Machine Gun Battalion, 37th Division.
While voluntarily going forward on a mission of establishing liaison between a front-line unit of his own division and the division on the right, Major Chambers encountered a large number of men falling back in confusion, badly disorganized and without leaders, as a result of a heavy artillery fire and machine-gun fire from pill boxes in the woods and from a strong point on the heights havend. With the greatest energy, courage, and leadership, at a heights beyond. With the greatest energy, courage, and leadership, at a most critical time and under a heavy fire, he reorganized the scattered troops, put them in trenches, and later led them forward, overcoming a stubborn resistance from machine guns, drove the enemy from his position, reestablished the front line and accomplished his liaison mission. By his calmness, By his calmness, decision, and courage he inspired great confidence among the scattered and confused troops.

First lieutenant, 94th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
While on a mission, Lieutenant Chambers, accompanied by another machine piloted by First Lieut. Samuel Kaye, jr., encountered a formation of six enemy machines (Fokker type) at an altitude of 3,000 feet. Despite numerical superiority of the enemy, Lieutenant Chambers and Lieutenant Kaye immodistily attacked and accounted in the light characteristics. mediately attacked and succeeded in destroying one and forced the remaining five to retreat into their own lines.

Oak-leaf clusters (3).

A bronze oak-leaf cluster was awarded to Lieutenant Chambers for each of the following acts of extraordinary herosim in action: First oak-leaf cluster: Near Montfaucon and Vilosnes-sur-Meuse, France, Oct. 2, 1918, Lieutenant Chambers, while on a mission, at an altitude of 2,000 feet, encountered an enemy two-seater (Halberstadt type). He immediately attacked and, after a brief combat, succeeded in shooting it down. Second oak-leaf cluster: Near Montfaucon and Vilosnes-sur-Meuse, France, Oct. 2, 1918, at 7.40 o'clock, Lieutenant Chambers saw four enemy machines (Fokker type) attacking another American machine (Spad type). He immediately went to its rescue, and, after a few minutes of fierce combat, he succeeded in shooting down one. Third oak-leaf cluster: Near the Bois-de-la-Cote-Lemonte, France, Oct. 22, 1918, while on a voluntary patrol, Captain Chambers encountered five enemy planes (Fokker type) harassing our infantry at an altitude of 300 meters. Attacking them without hesitation, he shot down that the statement. two of them and drove the others off.

First lieutenant, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.

Assisting the battalion commander, who had been severely wounded in the early fighting, he maintained the liaison personnel, making many journeys himself through heavy shelling. When the battalion commander had been evacuated, he assumed command, and moved the battalion to its new position.

Private, first class, sanitary detachment, 105th Engineers, 30th Division. When an enemy airplane dropped a bomb in the camp of his organization, killing one soldier and wounding seven, including himself, he administered first aid to the other wounded, helped carry them to the dressing station, and there gave further assistance in dressing and evacuating the wounded men, never mentioning his own serious injuries until he knew that all the others had been cared for.

First lieutenant, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He fearlessly exposed himself to severe artillery and machine-gun fire and located machine-gun nests and sniper posts harassing his company and hindering its advance. He then led his platoon forward in the face of heavy fire and destroyed the nests.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Irene M. Chandler.

Corporal, Company L, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
While his company was leading in a battalion attack, Corporal Chandler persisted in carrying messages to the battalion commander and carrying rations to the line under intensive machine-gun fire from the front and flanks, after he had been very severely wounded.

Private, Company C, 317th Infantry, 80th Division. He crawled in front of the line under heavy machine-gun fire and carried a wounded soldier to safety.

Private, 101st Ambulance Company, 101st Sanitary Train, 26th Division. He assisted in establishing a dressing station in a dugout under a heavy shell-fire. When it was destroyed by a shell he worked unceasingly in the open under fire from enemy machine guns and snipers, caring for the wounded. He remained at his post for several hours after his station had been ordered closed, permitting neither his own exhaustion nor the enemy fire to deter him from aiding the wounded.

Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 7th Infantry, 3d Division. During the German offensive of July 15, Private Chapin, while under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire, carried three messages to front-line platoons. On Oct. 11, in the Meuse-Argonne offensive, after all his squad were killed by a shell which buried the gun, Private Chapin dug the gun out and moved it to a new position, where he resumed firing on the enemy and assisted in repulsing a counterattack.

Second lieutenant, 94th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
While on patrol duty, he courageously attacked a group of four monoplanes and one biplane and succeeded in bringing one down before he himself was shot down in flames.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, C. W. Chapman.

Captain, 5th Machine Gun Battalion, attached to 9th Infantry, 2d Division. During a heavy enemy counterattack he remained constantly in front of his company, directing its fire and encouraging its efforts. His bravery was mainly responsible in preventing the enemy's advance and the taking of its position.

First lieutenant, 339th Infantry, 85th Division (detachment in north Russia). Lieutenant Chappel led his men in attack agains† a superior force of the enemy. Disregarding all personal danger, he personally advanced upon enemy machine guns, then in action, thereby assisting in building up a firing line of the attacking force. He was killed while making this dash. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Zada H. Chappel.

Private, Company I, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.

Although badly wounded by shell fire, during the heavy artillery fire of the enemy's offensive, Private Chappell remained at his post in the front line, until ordered to the rear by his commanding officer.

Private, Company L, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.
When his company was held up by barbed wire during an attack on hostile machine guns, he displayed marked courage in crawling over the wire to the dugout occupied by the enemy and capturing, single handed, 20 prisoners and a machine gun.

First sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 357th Infantry, 90th Division. He volunteered to go forward with the patrol of three on two occasions to destroy machine-gun nests which were holding up our advance. Both missions were successful, the enemy emplacements being reduced and the advance resumed. Sergeant Chartier exposed himself voluntarily to the fire of the enemy guns that they might be located by the flash.

Private, Company H, 140th Infantry, 35th Division.

Private Chartier voluntarily went forward in the face of intense artillery and machine-gun fire and cut gaps through wire entanglements in order to facilitate the advance of his battalion.

Corporal, Company L, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.

For repeated acts of extraordinary heroism in action near Jaulgonne, France.

On July 15 Corporal Chase made two trips through a violent barrage to locate missing comrades. On July 23 he volunteered and found a first-aid station, to which he carried many of the wounded. On July 24, after his company had been relieved, he voluntarily remained behind until all wounded were evacuated, during which time he was exposed to unusual shellfire.

Corporal, 80th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He assumed command of his platoon in the attack on enemy machine-gun positions in the Bois-de-Belleau, France, on June f, 1918, during which he and his men captured two machine guns and killed their crews. He did not retire from the action until all of his men had been killed or wounded.

Private, 75th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. While his platoon was occupying an outpost line in close proximity to the enemy, he voluntarily crossed an open space swept by machine-gun fire and overcame three snipers who had been harrassing his platoon.

Private, first class, Company M, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
Under heavy shell fire, when movement in the open was extremely hazardous, he made eight trips from the front lines to battalion headquarters with important messages. His courage, high sense of duty, and coolness under fire were an example of heroism and devotion to duty which inspired his comrades.

Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 132d Infantry, 33d Division. While engaged in maintaining a line of communication, Sergeant Cheevers saw 4 of the enemy enter a dugout during an attack. Armed with only a pistol, he followed, and upon reaching the dugout he ordered the men to come out. When they refused he entered, routed out and captured 12 prisoners.

Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.

He displayed exceptional courage and skill in maintaining observation posts under heavy artillery fire. On his own initiative, accompanied only by his brother, he reconnoitered the advanced positions of his brigade, passing through three heavily shelled areas, subjected also to the fire of enemy snipers and machine gunners, obtaining information of great importance to his brigadenermender.

Private, Company B, 103d Machine Gun Battalion, 26th Division. When his unit advanced on Belleau and Givry he was seriously wounded in the left arm, but continued to carry his heavy gun with his right arm through 1,200 meters of enemy fire and took up his position with his squad. When a shell struck his position, severely wounding a conrade and half burying him, the gun, and the remainder of the squad, he extricated himself, assisted his companions to recover the gun, and remained at his post until ordered to a dressing station by his platoon commander.

Captain, 363d Infantry, 91st Division.

At the time when troops on the left had retired, Captain Chenoweth, with his company, covered the left flank of his division and thus prevented an attack by the enemy upon its flank. After being severely wounded, he remained at his post until he had issued the necessary orders for holding the position he had seized.

Sergeant, Company B, 11th Machine Gun Battalion, 4th Division.

He commanded the third platoon of his company during the engagement near St. Thibaut. On Aug. 7, 1918, he crossed the Vesle River and took up a position in front of his own Infantry on terrain constantly swept by heavy artillery, machine-gun, and sniper fire and directed his guns so skillfully as to silence a machine-gun uest and make possible the Infantry advance. His conspicuous courage was an inspiration to his men. This gallant soldier was killed on Aug. 9, 1918, by a fragment from an acriel bomb.

After having been wounded he remained courageously at his post under heavy shell fire, and not only afforded an inspiring example by that fortitude but rescued comrades who had been buried when a shell caved in their trench at Soulain, France, July 16, 1918.

Private, 43d Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Upon seeing his captain wounded and lying in an exposed position, Private Christensen left shelter and rendered him first aid. He then carried the officer from the area where he had been lying, which was subjected to an intense machine-gun and artillery barrage.

First lieutenant, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.
On July 15, 1918, near Reims, France, immediately following the bombardment of his position, he conducted himself with heroic disregard of personal safety in speedily placing his men in such advantageous posts and spurring them to vigorous action by seizing a rifle and fighting himself on the parapet of the trench that the German charge at that point was instantly repulsed. Although wounded he remained on duty until the enemy was defeated and his men were safe.

Private, Machine Gun Company, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

After his platoon commander and the second in command had became casualties, Private Christenson took charge of the platoon, reorganized it, and led it forward, set up his machine guns in the open under the direct fire of enemy machine guns and artillery, and successfully silenced four enemy machine guns which were impeding the advance of the Infantry. Again he volunteered and carried a message from his company commander to the battalion post of command and brought back an answer without loss of time through a terrific enemy fire. After his company was relieved he returned to the former position with a detail of men and brought back all the wounded of his platoon, personally seeing that they were properly cared for and eyacuated. personally seeing that they were properly cared for and evacuated.

Private, first class, Company M, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.

After his company had suffered very heavy easualties, Private Cisek reorganized a group of about 35 men, under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire, and led them forward in the attack, a distance of about 2 kilometers, to the objective. Upon the capture of the objective he assisted in the consolidation of the position taken. tion of the position taken.

Sergeant, Company F, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
During the advance by his plateon upon machine-gun nests in Trugny Woods he observed a German machine gun on his right flank. He charged it single handed in the face of its fire, killed the gunners, and destroyed the gun. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Bridget Clubby.

Sergeant, medical detachment, 5th Maehine Gun Battalion, 2d Division. In a territory swept by the direct fire of two German batteries, he displayed great courage and devotion to duty in giving first aid to the wounded and in superintending their removal to a place of safety.

Private, first class, Company B, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

Although wounded several times, he stayed with his automatic rifle and assisted in the reconsolidation of his platoon. He was ordered to the aid station, but after receiving first aid insisted on returning to his post, where he remained working until forced to be evacuated.

Second lieutenant, 27th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Outnumbered and handicapped by his presence far behind the German lines, he and three flying companions fought brilliantly a large group of enemy planes, bringing down or putting to flight all in the attacking party, while performing an important mission near Luneville, France, June 13, 1918.

Sergeant, Company C, 39th Infantry, 4th Division.

Sergeant Clark was in command of one platoon of his company, which was held up by intense onemy machine-gun fire. Accompanied by two other soldiers, he voluntarily made an attack on one of the nests under heavy fire, firing a rifle grenade into it and foreing its surrender. He then advanced on another machine-gun nest and captured it, taking seven prisoners from both nests. His platoon having been forced to fail back by machine-gun fire from the rear, he reorganized it and led it in a successful attack on 75 of the enemy whom he discovered near by whom he discovered near by.

Private, 83d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Displaying remarkable devotion to duty, Private Clark remained on duty as a battalion runner for six days and nights, almost without rest, continually risking his life in crossing fields swept by machine-gun and shellfire on liaison and reconnaissance missions, for which he volunteered. Each night he organized and guided earrying parties, bringing food and water to the men in the front lines.

Sergeant, Battery D, 122d Field Artillery, 33d Division.
When his battery eehelon was bombed, Sergeant Clark, with great courage and presence of mind, conducted his men to shelter, and then took charge of rescuing and treating the wounded, until he was himself severely wounded by an exploding bomb, necessitating the amputation of one of his arms.

Corporal, 43d Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Learning that a number of wounded soldiers were lying in no man's land, he immediately volunteered to help carry them in. He made several trips over an area which was constantly shelled and subjected to machine-gun and rifle Private, first class, medical detachment, 104th Infantry, 26th Division.

While a member of the medical detachment, 104th Infantry, he exhibited rare courage and devotion to duty, repeatedly exposing himself to a concentration of hostile machine-gun fire while applying first aid and carrying wounded men from the front lines to the dressing stations. His complete disregard for his own safety and his devotion to his comrades greatly inspired the men of his battalion.

Sergeant, Company G, 115th Infantry, 29th Division.
He remained for two days by himself in a sniper's post in advance of the front line, killing 12 enemy seouts. When all of the officers of his company had been incapacitated, this soldier took command and steaded his men by his own coolness and courage. He remained on duty until he was severely wounded while leading a combat hisson patrol.

Private, 47th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Although wounded in the attack on Bois-de-Belleau, France, he crossed through enemy territory to convey a message.

Four of his patrol were killed and I wounded in the killed or wounded. Four of his patrol were killed and I wounded in the encounter. He bandaged the wounded man and returned to our lines, carrying a wounded German prisoner.

Private, first class, Company D, 120th Infantry, 30th Division.
With 8 other soldiers, comprising the company headquarters detachment, he assisted his company commander in cleaning out enemy dugouts along a canal and capturing 242 prisoners.

Second lieutenant, 11th Infantry, 5th Division. He set an example of bravery and self-sacrifice to his men during the period Nov. 5-9, 1918. On Nov. 10, while assembling his company, he discovered a wounded man lying in a place exposed to machine-gun fire, and regardless of his own danger carried him to a place of safety.

First lieutenant, 9th Balloon Company, Air Service. While making a general surveillance of enemy territory on Aug. 28 and Sept. 26 he was attacked by enemy planes. On both occasions he remained at his post and directed the fire by telephone until his balloon had been set on fire. On Aug. 28 he assisted a passenger to descend and did not jump himself until the other's parachute had opened. On both occasions he reascended as soon as another balloon could be obtained.

Accompanying two other soldiers, Private Clashy rushed forward in advance of his lines, exposed to heavy machine-gun fire, and cuptured two machine guns and six of the enemy who were manning the position.

Private, Company F, 362d Infantry, 91st Division.

When the advance of the front line was held up by fire from a machine-gun nest 300 yards to the front, Private Clauson, with two others, crossed the open field in the face of fire from enemy artillery, machine guns, and snipers. Charging the nest they killed two of the crew, wounded two others, and captured five, together with the machine gun. Corporal, Company K, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.

After all runners had become casualties in attempting to carry out their missions Corporal Clay voluntarily assumed the duties of company runner. His efforts were materially responsible for success gained during the day during the course of which he repeatedly exposed himself to direct enemy artillery and machine-gun fire.

First lieutenant, 148th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

In an action wherein Lieutenant Clay's patrol was outnumbered two to one, he attacked the group and shot down the enemy aircraft in flames. He continued in the combat and later attacked two enemy aircraft which were pursuing a plane of his patrol and succeeded in shooting one enemy aircraft down. Again, on Sept. 27, 1918, near Cambrai, France, with one other pilot, Lieutenant Clay observed five enemy planes approaching our lines and, although hopelossly outnumbered, immediately attacked and singled out a plane which was seen to crash to the ground. He was immediately attacked by the other enemy planes and compelled to fight his way back to our lines.

He at all times disregarded his personal safety, and his splendid work was an inspiration to all those associated with him.

First lieutenant, pilot, observation group, Air Service, 4th Army Corps. On Sept. 12 Lieutenant Coleman, pilot, and second Lieutenant William Belzer, observer, while on an artillery surveillance mission, were attacked by an enemy plane. They waited nntil the enemy was at close range and then fired 50 rounds directly into the vital parts of the enemy machine, which was seen to disappear out of control. The next day Lieutenants Belzer and Coleman, while on a reconnaissance mission, were attacked by seven enemy aircraft. They unhesitatingly opened fire, but, owing to their guns being jammed, were forced to withdraw to our lines, where, clearing the jam, they returned to finish the mission. Their guns again jammed, and they were driven back by a large patrol of enemy planes. After skillful maneuvering they succeeded in putting one gun into use and returned a third time, only to be driven back. Undaunted, they returned the fourth time and aecomplished their mission, transmitting valuable information to the Infantry headquarters. ĥeadquarters.

First lieutenant, Cavalry, aid-de-camp, 1st Infantry Brigade, 1st Division. His liaison group having suffered many casualties, Lieutenant Coleman exposed himself to heavy fire on two different occasions in traversing the front line of the 18th Infantry during the attack. His route lay over a steep hillside, subjected to a heavy concentration of artillery, machine-gun, and sniper fire. He continued to carry messages after learning that the enemy had the exact range of the post of command and a shell struck the building, killing several of the men. Having had nothing to eat for 36 hours, he finally fell, completely exhausted.

Second lieutenant, 104th Infantry, 26th Division. On Oct. 16 Lieutenant Colley led his company to the enemy's trenches despite the failure of supporting tanks to advance. After the order to withdraw had been given, he remained on the field, personally superintending the removal of every wounded man. He crawled along the ground for a long distance under the close-range fire of enemy machine guns in order to make sure that no wounded men had been left behind.

First lieutenant, 308th Infantry, 77th Division. Though wounded, he voluntarily went through shell fire and gave first aid to wounded members of his platoon, thereby receiving additional wounds.

Corporal, Company D, 359th Infantry, 90th Division. He courageously led his squad through severe machine-gun and artillery fire and drove off several machine-gun crews. Next day, after being wounded by fire from a heavy Maxim gun, he continued the advance, captured the gun, killed one of the crew, and took two prisoners.

Private, Headquarters Company, 6th Field Artillery, 1st Division.
Private Collier voluntarily went forward and made his way to the enemy front lines to locate hostile artillery firing at short range on our batteries.
While on this mission, he was seriously wounded by machine-gun fire.

Sergeant, first class, medical detachment, 316th Engineers, 91st Division. He corrageously and skillfully directed his men in giving aid to wounded soldiers under heavy shellfire. After being wounded he continued on duty until weariness forced him to go to the hospital. Within two days he was again with his detachment.

Private, Company C, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.

When the advance of his platoon was beld up by enemy fire from a machinegun nest on Hill 212, Private Collins with several others eharged the nest, but were repulsed with heavy losses, all but three of the party being killed or wounded. He and two comrades immediately volunteered and made the second assault, which was successful. His courageous and gallant actions were an inspiration to his company. He was severely wounded on July 30.

Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 168th Infantry, 42d Division. After being wounded Sergeant Collins voluntarily returned to his company as soon as he had received first aid and fought courageously until he was killed.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Fanny Collins.

Private, Company D, 114th Infantry, 29th Division. He displayed exceptional bravery carrying messages as a runner through barrage fire and gassed areas with heroic devotion to duty until he was finally overcome by gas.

Private, Company L, 308th Infantry; 77th Division.

Private Collins, with another soldier, volunteered to cross a level open space for 600 yards, swept by converging machine-gun fire, to deliver a message to the front line, undeterred by the knowledge that six other soldiers had been wounded in a similar attempt. Crawling from one shell hole to another he succeeded in reaching the front line and delivering the message.

First sergeant, Company D, 312th Infantry, 78th Division. Upon his own initiative he crossed an open field heavily swept by machine-gun-fire, and assisted by two other soldiers, carried to shelter his company com-mander, who had been mortally wounded.

Sergeant, Company M, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.
Being informed that a wounded man was lying in No Man's Land, Sergeant Collins immediately volunteered and with Pvt. William A. Pitts, of Company M, of the same regiment, went to his aid. The intense fire of the enemy necessitated crawling the entire distance. While on the return trip the wounded man was hit by a machine-gun bullet and instantly killed, but these two men brought in the dead body, crawling with great difficulty over the shell-torn ground.

Corporal, Company D, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
When his platoon was checked at the wire in front of a strongly manned enemy trench, acting on his own initiative, he led his Lewis-gun squad around the left flank of the platoon under terrific hand grenade, rifle, and machine-gun fire from the enemy. Leading his squad, he jumped into a German trench and, with his Lewis gun, inflicted heavy consulties, silenced an enemy machine gun, and compelled many of the enemy to surrender. Then, by his rifle fire, he prevented the enemy from advancing in the trench from the left. While in the act of mopping up this trench Corporal Collins was killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Peter Collins, sr.

Sergeant, Company L, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.

In the face of heavy machine-gun fire and grenades, he went forward with three other soldiers and brought back five seriously wounded men to a point where they could be given first-aid treatment. With utter disregard for his personal safety, he displayed coolness and good judgment effecting the rescue.

Captain, 327th Infantry, 82d Division.

After the barrage had failed to fall on time, he led his platoon into the face of machine-gun fire, personally capturing one gun and turning it on the enemy, causing them to flee in disorder. Having reached his objective, he organized his positions under a heavy artillery barrage.

Private, Company F, 312th Infantry, 78th Division. Upon being wounded by a shell, he refused to go to the rear, but remained on the firing line against the advice of his commanding officer, dressing wounds of two comrades.

Second lieutenant, 116th Engineers, attached to Company F, 107th Engineers, 32d Division.

From Aug. 4 to 6, 1918, he successfully carried out a reconnaissance for the location of possible bridge sites across the River Vesle, near Fismes, France. He was constantly under heavy shellfire and was frequently harassed by fire from hidden machine-gun nests in the town. Nevertheless, he passed beyond our farthest lines and secured the desired information. He was wounded before his mission was accomplished, but refused to return to his battalion until he had made his reconnaissance and had been relieved by another detail.

While on a photographic mission in the vicinity of Damvillers, which necessitated a penetration of 20 kilometers within the enemy lines, Captain Cook was attacked by seven enemy pursuit planes and his plane was riddled with bullets. In spite of the attack he continued on his mission, turning only for our lines when his observer had secured photographs of great military value. In the combat one enemy aircraft was destroyed.

Second lieutenant, 4th Engineers, 4th Division.

He directed the construction of an artillery bridge on the Vesle River under constant machine-gun and shell fire, setting a splendid example to the members of his command by his disregard of danger. On the morning of Aug. 11, he was wounded while personally looking after the safety of an outguard during a heavy bombardment.

Major, 23d Infantry, 2d Division. He led his battalion in an attack, although exposed to machine-gun fire from both flanks and front, steadying and encouraging his men by his fearless example. He was instantly killed while directing the reduction of a strongly intrenched machine-gun position.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Fred A. Cook.

First lieutenant, 94th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

Oak-leaf cluster.

For the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near Crepion, France, Oct. 30, 1918, Lieutenant Cook is awarded an oak-leaf cluster, to be worn with the distinguished-service cross: He attacked three enemy biplanes at an altitude of 1,000 meters. After a few minutes of severe fighting his guns jammed, but after clearing the jam he returned to the attack, shot down one of his adversaries in flames and forced the other two to retire to their own lines. lines

Private, 95th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Private Cook repeatedly volunteered and carried messages for his battalion commander through severe machine-gun and artillery fire. He also exposed himself in an open field for several hours under fire in order to locate enemy snipers and machine-gun nests.

Captain, 7th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.

Captain, Am Machine dum Battando, an Dyslon.

After marching all night to his company's position for the initial attack, Captain

Cook personally led the advance upon the enemy, inspiring his men by his bravery and determination, frequently going ahead of his company to reconnoiter its position. Even after being wounded in the leg by machine-gun fire he continued forward until he received three more wounds.

Sergeant, Company G, 120th Infantry, 30th Division.

When his platoon was held up by machine-gun fire during an advance, although suffering from a painful machine-gun bullet wound in the hand, he personally killed the gunner and put the gun out of action, thus permitting the further advance of his platoon.

Sergeant, Company A, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.

He crawled ont in front of the lines some hundred yards to locate enemy snipers. While in this perilous position, he fred upon and put out of action a group of enemy machine gunners, thus exposing his position, and drawing enemy sniper fire. Having in his possession a number of asphyxiating grenades which emit a dense white smoke, he hurled one of them at the sniper's position, and, under cover of this improvised smoke screen, walked back to the lines.

Gunnery sergeant, 43d Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

Without regard for his own personal safety, he rescued two men who were buried with dirt by the explosion of a German ammunition dump, and refused to find cover for himself until every man of his command had found a place of safety.

Corporal, Company B, 3d Infantry, U. S. Army. For gallantry in action in the trenches at Santiago, Cuba, on July 2, 1898.

Sergeant, 315th Train Headquarters and Military Police, 90th Division. During a very heavy attack in the vicinity of his post, where artillery fire and aircraft machine-run fire had created a most confusing situation, he calmly directed traffic, aided wounded, and removed obstructions, thereby preventing wild disorder. He also assisted the drivers of ammunition trucks in getting their machines to places of safety. COOLAHAN, WILLIAM T. (1257762) -Near Fismes, France, Aug. 9, 1918. R—Philadelphia, Pa. Private, first class, Company B, 109th Machine Gun Battalion, 28th Division. Private Coolahan exposed himself to heavy machine-gun fire to stand in the middle of the Vesle River and assist the members of his section across the stream. His individual courage was an important factor in enabling his organization to cross the stream and take up a position to cover the crossing of Infantry units.

Private, first class, Headquarters Company, 101st Infantry, 26th Division. He left shelter and exposed himself to intense machine-gun fire when he saw a soldier lying wounded in advance of our lines. He reached the wounded man, despite the enemy fire, and dragged him back to a place of safety.

Captain, 94th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

Leading a protection patrol, he went to the assistance of two observation planes which were being attacked by six German machines. Observing this maneuver, the enemy sent up a terrific barrage from antiaircraft guns on the ground. Disregarding the extreme danger, he dived straight into the barrage, and his plane was struck and sent down in flames.

Then seeing his platoon about to advance, he returned under fire to the fire. Then seeing his platoon about to advance, he returned under fire to the place where he had picked up the wounded man, secured his own rifle, and returned to join the advance.

Captain, photographic section, Signal Corps, 26th Division.
On July 18, 1918, he advanced fearlessly under enemy fire to an exposed position in a shell hole in front of the attacking troops in order to carry out a photographic mission. While in this position he went to the rescue of a wounded graphic mission. While in this position he went to the rescue of a wounded man and carried him to the shelter of a shell hole about 100 yards to the rear. Later he assisted in the evacuation of enemy prisoners. On July 20 he again advanced to a forward position in order to secure pictures of the attacking troops. His gallant conduct stimulated the morale of the advancing troops.

Mechanic, Company B, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

Mechanic Copeland, with a companion, left the protection of a trench, and in the face of heavy machine-gun and grenade fire went in advance of our lines to rescue a wounded comrade. They were exposed to heavy fire from the time they left the trench. Mechanic Copeland's companion was killed as they were returning to the trench, but he, however, struggled on and succeeded in dragging the wounded man to safety.

Private Copeland, with 5 being without boats or raits with which to cross, Frivate Copeland, with 5 other members of his company, volunteered to swim the river. Displaying great gallantry and with utter disregard for his life, he swam the river in the face of heavy rifle fire, returned on a raft, secured arms and ammunition, crossed a second time, and took part in an attack which drove a superior force of the enemy from their trenches and the town occupied by them, thereby making possible the further advance of his company.

Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 117th Infantry, 30th Division. When his platoon was held up by enemy artillery fire Private Coram, a runner, succeeded in passing through the severe fire and establishing liaison with the Infantry near by. On Oct. 9 he again showed unusual coolness in carrying a message through a wood containing numerous enemy snipers and machine guns.

First sergeant, 49th Company, 5th Regiment, U.S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Finding himself one of a few noncommissioned officers left alive after a desper-ate attack by the enemy, he organized a defensive position under heavy fire, ate attack by the enemy, he organized a detensive position under heavy hre, withstanding numerous counterattacks. On the night of June 12 he led a patrol of three men into the enemy's lines, secured valuable information, and although wounded in the eye assisted in carrying from no man's land men more seriously wounded than himself, refusing evacuation until receiving peremptory orders from his company commander. Realizing his battalion was hard pressed for noncommissioned officers, he left the hospital tation was hard pressed for noncommissioned officers, he left the hospital without permission, returned to the front lines, and brought up reinforcements under heavy shell fire at a critical time. On Oct. 4, 1918, on Blanc Mont Ridge, Chanpagne, France, as battalion intelligence officer, he fearlessly exposed himself to enemy fire to secure important information; severely wounded by a bursting shell, and incapacitated by gas, he refused aid from contrades in order that the attack might not be delayed.

Corporal, Company G, 26th Infantry, 1st Division. He led an automatic-rifle squad near Soissons, France, July 19, 1918, until all his men had been killed or wounded, and then alone, from a farther advanced position, silenced the machine gun which had decimated his command.

Captain, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Captain Cornell courageously led his company through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire in the attack on a strongly defended enemy position. His company held the exposed flank, and later, when the battalion withdrew, he skillfully covered the other shifting units while exposed to heavy enemy fire.

First lieutenant, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
He showed complete disregard of self in placing his men to the best advantage under machine-gun and artillery fire near Soissons, France, July 20-21, 1913, and in the last of the fighting rendered invaluable assistance under fire in the reorganization of the battalion of which his command was a part.

Marine gunner, 73d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Killed in action at Chatean-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he gave the supreme proof of that extraordinary heroism which will serve as an example to hitherto untried troops.

As battalion intelligence officer, he repeatedly went in front of his own and adjoining battalions to secure information which he conveyed to regimental headquarters over fields swept by artillery and machine-gun fire. When the advance of his battalion was checked by destructive hostile fire, this officer, disregarding personal danger, conducted a personal reconnaissance, locating many machine guns and strongholds. He was killed while voluntarily leading and placing troops in advantageous positions to reduce these machine-gun nests.

Private, Company M, 168th Infantry, 42d Division.

He distinguished himself northeast of Chateau-Thierry, France, on July 28, 1918, when with four other men he raided an enemy machine-gun nest held by 12 Germans. As a result of daring and presence of mind, one of the enemy was killed, the other 11 captured, and their four machine guns turned upon the retreating foe.

Private, Company L, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
When his company commander, for whom he was orderly, was wounded, he carried the wounded officer for 75 yards, under heavy fire, to a shell hole. When this location was fired upon by a machine gun, he crawled out, against his captain's advice, attacked the enemy position, and brought back the gun. Though ordered by his company commander to leave him and save himself from the heavy fire to which they were subjected, he remained at his post until he could effect the officer's evacuation to the rear.

Private, Company D, 44th Infantry, U. S. Volunteers. Private Coston, accompanied by five other men, with utter disregard for his personal safety, gallantly ascended a steep, narrow, rocky trail under a direct fire of both cannon and rifles, and a hail of huge bowlders hurled down upon him, and succeeded in driving the insurgents from their strongly entrenched position and captured 12 cannon and a quantity of supplies.

Corporal, Company C, 105th Field Signal Battalion, 30th Division. In order to maintain communication between two regiments of Infantry, and, after an assisting detachment had suffered severe casualties, Corporal Cotten alone kept the line in repair, working under constant heavy shellfire. Although badly gassed, he refused evacuation, requesting and obtaining permission to continue with his work.

Captain, 2d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division.

When the advancing Infantry line had been held up by heavy artillery and machine gun fire and all the officers had become casualties, Captain Cotton sent what remained of his machine-gun company to protect the flanks, and then voluntarily reorganized the assaulting line, breaking up a hostile counter-attack which had been launched from the hill in front of them. Twice during the action he personally led tanks forward in advance of the line and reduced hostile machine-gun nests. As he was leading the attacking waves forward in the face of heavy fire, he was seriously wounded in the head by a machine-gun bullet, but he pushed on until he was forced to stop by loss of blood.

Sergeant, Company A, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.

Sergeant Couchot voluntarily proceeded with four other men the distance of about 400 yards in advance of our line and attacked a superior force of the enemy who were attempting to man a machine gun in a disabled French tank. Due to this bold attack the enemy was driven off and the tank retaken. Company A, 18th Infantry, was thereby enabled to continue the advance with slight loss.

Private, Company L, 312th Infantry, 78th Division. He volunteered and maintained liaison with a company which had been cut off from the rest of the battalion, making several trips across open ground for 150 yards under intense machine-gun fire.

Corporal, Company C, 101st Field Signal Battalion, 26th Division. When telephone communication to the rear had been cut and its reestablishment was impossible because of the intensity of the bombardment, he voluntarily carried important messages to the rear through a violent artillery barrage and machine gun and rifle fire.

Private, Company D, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
Private Courtney, a stretcher bearer, displayed exceptional gallantry in continuing to remove wounded from a field swept by machine-gun fire of such intensity that five of his associates were killed and two others wounded.

Second lieutenant, 102d Machine Gun Battallon, 26th Division.
He was wounded while conducting his platoon into position preparatory to laying a barrage for a raid. With utter disregard for his personal safety he remained on duty for more than an hour, satisfying himself that all of his guns were properly laid and adjusted for firing. After his wounds were dressed he returned to duty and remained with his platoon until it was relieved.

Sergeant, Company I, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Sergeant Cox bravely took command of Company I after all officers of his company had been killed or wounded. He quickly recorganized the company, and, in the face of heavy machine-gun fire, led the company forward to its objective. He consolidated his position and held the line until relieved the

Second lieutenant, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.

He left St. Thibaut in broad daylight with another officer and a patrol of 10 men to reconnoiter the enemy's positions across the Vesle River. The patrol divided and Lieutenant Cox conducted his half to the chateau in Buzoches, a recognized German post. He entered the yerd of the chateau, met parties of the enemy personally, killed two and wounded another, who were firing on members of his patrol; continued his observations, though fired upon by machine guns, and with great skill withdrew his patrol under fire without loss, having regimed valuable information. having gained valuable information.

First lieutenant, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.
From the beginning of the battle till evacuated from the field severely wounded, he displayed exceptional heroism, bravery, and devotion to duty of the highest order. Especially courageous was his work on Sept. 14 in the Bois-de-Bonvaux, when, facing a murderous machine-gun fire, many of his men down, himself twice wounded, he held his ground until reinforcements came up and surrounded and captured the enemy machine-gun nest. His work was a splendid example to the entire command.

Sergeant, first class, Company A, 105th Field Signal Battalion, 30th Division. He volunteered and assisted a British soldier to reestablish communication lines, which the beavy artillery fire had made useless. Crawling through almost direct machine-gun fire and making his way through barbed wire, he reached his point, where he remained for almost two hours. He made his way back to our lines, through an intense hand-grenade bombardment.

Private, Company D, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
He continued to care for the wounded under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire after he himself was severely injured. He has since died as a result of the wounds received in action.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Michael J. Coxe.

First Sergeant, Company II, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
On July 18, 1918, Sergeant Coyle, after carrying his wounded company commander to safety and dressing his wounds, took command of the company, all the officers having been either killed or wounded, and reorganized it under heavy enemy fire. On the following day he successfully led the company in the attack, attaining all objectives. He later exposed himself to heavy machine-gun fire while directing units in order to repulse an enemy counterattack. While in performance of this act he was killed by enemy fire.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Josephine Sanderson derson.

Captain, 363d Infantry, 91st Division.
While on duty as liaison officer, Captain Coyle observed a strongly fortified enemy trench, which was a menace to further advance. He organized a group of 14 men, and in the face of heavy machine-gun and sniper fire led then in an attack on the trench. Through his quick decision and courage the hostile position was captured with 52 prisoners, 3 heavy and 2 light machine guns.

First lieutenant, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
While advancing with his company he wrenched his leg severely in the crossing of the Ourcq River, but continued in the advance. Later he was severely wounded by machine-gun bullets in the left thigh, but again refused evacuation, and continued in command of his company until the objective had been reached and the position consolidated, remaining nine hours with his company after having been wounded.

Private, 6th Machine Gun Battalion, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He voluntarily left a sheltered position under intense enemy bombardment, dressed the wounds of four wounded men lying in a position exposed to intense enemy machine-gun fire, carried them one by one to a place of safety, and then went for a stretcher hearer to assist him in evacuating them.

Corporal, 316th Train Headquarters and Military Police, 91st Division. Engaged in regulating traffic at an important distributing point, which was suddenly bombarded, Corporal Craddock, by his coolness, prevented a general stampede when drivers and working parties started to seek cover.

Private, Headquarters Company, 322d Field Artillery, 83d Division. He, with utter disregard for his personal safety, constantly exposed himself to enemy fire while repairing wires and maintaining important telephone communications within his area. *Craidge, Robert E At Hill 212, near Cierges, northeast of Chateau-Thierry, France, July 31, 1918.

His courageous action was an inspiration to his men and made possible the advance of the attacking wave.

Lieutenant colonel, headquarters 16th Infantry, 1st Division. After the commander of the front-line battalion and most of the junior officers had been killed, he voluntarily left regimental headquarters and assumed command of the assault battalion. He led a small detachment of soldiers in a personal reconnaissance, locating and destroying machine-gun nests, thereby permitting the battalion to continue the advance, which he led personally until he was killed.

Corporal, Company H, 361st Infantry, 91st Division.
He was a member of a patrol sent out to reconnoiter the town of Audenarde.
This patrol discovered several enemy machine-gun sniper posts, located in buildings, which were enflading the streets of the town. With another soldier, he dodged from building to building and entering one of the houses containing a machine gun, captured 2 machine gunners.

Private, Company B, 150th Machine Gun Battalion, 42d Division. He showed extraordinary courage and ability as a leader of men in field of battle. When his section sergeant had been killed and his corporal wounded, he assumed command of his gun section and led them forward against the enemy, directing the fire with effect nntil killed.

First lieutenant, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Lieutenant Crandall led a platoon across the Marne River. When fired upon from three directions the patrol was forced back to the river bank. Finding some of the men missing, he alone returned to the place within the enemy lines in order to guide back the missing members of the patrol. In an encounter with a group of the enemy he captured and brought back an enemy noncommissioned officer.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Agnes E. Crandall.

Private, Company A, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.

After his company had taken shelter from the enflading machine-gun and trench-mortar fire of the enemy, Private Crandall, with 2 other soldiers, crawled to the aid of wounded comrades, thus saving the lives of at least 2, while exposed to terrific fire of the enemy.

Lieutenant colonel, 6th Field Artillery, 1st Division. Having on the morning of that day (July 18, 1918) advanced his batteries 3 miles and, finding that the normal liaison between Artillery and Infantry was not then operating and that observation of fire from near the batteries was imposthen operating and that observation of fire from near the batteries was impossible, went forward himself to locate our Infantry front line and to personally conduct fire on the enemy's forces. He advanced through heavy enemy artilery and machine-gun fire over a terrain easily visible to the enemy to the front line of the supported infantry at Chaudun, where he drew down a violent shelling from enemy artillery. Undeterred by this and seeing German machine-gun detachments advancing to position a short distance from him, he continued to seek a favorable point of observation. While engaged in this dangerous and self imposed mission he was desperately wounded. He constantly exposed himself to danger and rendered service of great value.

Private, first class, 101st Ambulance Company, 101st Sanitary Train, 26th Division.

He assisted in establishing a dressing station in a dugout in an advanced posi-tion. When it was destroyed by a shell he worked unceasingly in the open under fire from enemy machine guns and snipers, caring for the wounded. He remained at his post for several hours after his station had been ordered closed, permitting neither his own exhaustion wor the enemy fire to deter him from aiding the wounded.

Private, Headquarters Company, 372d Infantry, 93d Division. He was acting as liaison agent between regimental headquarters and the battalien. Having carried a message through a heavy bombardment to the commander of a battalion which was about to make an attack he joined the first wave of the attack and dashed into the enemy's trenches. Seeing 2 of the enemy rush to a dugout he followed them and brought 10 prisoners from the dugout, killing 2 who tried to escape.

Private, Company B, 3d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division. He bravely carried messages through shellfire and reorganized and directed Infantry units. Intrusted with a particularly important message, that he knew must be delivered, he fearlessly started through a heavy bembardment to execute his mission, and while so engaged was severely wounded.

Private, first class, Company C, 316th Field Signal Battalion, 91st Division. First lieutenant, 148th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

Being on enemy patrol on Sept. 26, 1918, at Cambrai, France, when a large number of enemy airplanes were encountered, in the fight that ensued Lieutenant Creech shot down 2 of the enemy planes and saved the commander of our patrol from being shot down. On Oct. 28, 1918, near Jenlain, France, Lieutenant Creech's flight of 5 planes was attacked by 8 Fokker biplanes. In this encounter Lieutenant Creech also shot down 2 enemy planes. On Sept. 28, 1918, south of Masnieres, France, Lieutenant Creech with his flight attacked an enemy balloon and compelled the observers to jump. Enemy troops were then attacked in close formation, causing many consulties and attacked an enemy balloon and compelled the observers to jump. Enemy troops were then attacked in close formation, causing many casualties and scattering all the troops. In all of these encounters Lieutenant Creech displayed high courage, great valor, and utter disregard of danger. He constantly went to the assistance of members of his flight and exposed himself with great fearlessness, and yet with all displayed keen judgment and tireless energy. He proved himself a leader of unusual ability, and was a constant inspiration to the members of his company. inspiration to the members of his command.

Private, 55th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. While carrying a message in the Bois-de-Belleau he was surrounded by a detachment of Germans, who demanded his surrender. By his initiative and quick action he not only was able to return to our lines but captured four of the Germans and brought them to our lines. He then selected a different route and delivered the message.

Private, Company E, 314th Infantry, 79th Division.
Private Cressman, first carrier for his automatic-rifle team, advanced with a patrol against strong machine-gun positions. Although wounded five times, he refused to be taken back and continued to load the automatic rifle in the face of heavy machine-gun fire.

Corporal Cresswell, having succeeded to the command of his platoon, displayed the utmost bravery and fearlessness in personally leading his platoon in repeated attacks against the createst which have not set the createst which have not set the createst and the set of the command of the comman bravery and learlessness in personally leading his plation in repeated attacks against the enemy, during which he exposed himself with great courage. He proved himself an inspiring and successful leader in all these attacks. On Oct. 26, with utter disregard of danger, he personally led an attack, successfully wiping out a group of 4 machine-gun nests, thereby clearing dangerous terrain and allowing the unit on his right to successfully proceed with the counterattack. He went without rest and sleep to the point of exhaustion, and his personal valor and bravery gave added impetus to his men, so that under his able leadership all the new objectives during these dates were captured until the plation itself was relieved on Oct. 29 tured until the platoon itself was relieved on Oct. 29.

First sergeant, Company F, 130th Infantry, 33d Division. When all the company runners had been wounded during a raid by his battalion, he volunteered to establish liaison with an adjacent company. While going through a beavy barrage under sniper fire from 3 directions he was knocked unconscious by the concussion of a bursting shell. Upon recovering he succeeded in killing a sniper who was picking off our men and had wounded his company commander. Though unable to stand, Sergeant Crisp insisted upon remaining on duty with his company.

Private, Company K, 312th Infantry, 78th Division.
While his company was forced to lie in the open for a period of 24 hours, because of the murderous machine-gun and artillery fire of the enemy, Private Cristofaro, occupying a position in front of the company, advanced and attacked the enemy gun nests, silencing no less than three guns and killing their crews.

First lieutenant, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.

After his own company had reached the objective assigned to it, he made a personal recommaissance of the front and flank and discovered that the right-flank regiment was being held up by a strong machine-gun nest. He immediately maneuvered his company to a position where an enfilading fire could be delivered, enabling the flanking regiment to attain its objective. By utilizing the German arms and ammunition his company took up the advance, when it was discovered that a wide interval had been left between the two regiments because of a terrific machine-gun fire on the flanks of the regiments. He at once directed his company in the filling of this gap, holding the position during the night, as well as capturing four heavy and two light machine guns. Sergeant, medical detachment, 9th Infantry, 2d Division. He continued attending the wounded after the first-aid station, in which he was working, was struck by a shell, which wounded him and killed one of the men.

Captain, 11th Infantry, 5th Division.
When the assault battalion of his regiment had been held up by terrific hostile artillery and machine-gun fire, upon learning of the loss of all the company commanders, Captain Cromwell voluntarily left the supporting battalion and went forward through an almost overwhelming enemy fire to the advance position of the assault battalion, where, although wounded in the arm, he assisted the battalion commander in leading the men from a very disadvantageous position to the capture of a near-by hill held by the enemy, and later in the hostile counterattack assisted in the defense of the position.

Second lieutenant, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.
During the operations of his company which resulted in the capture of Murvaux, Lieutenant Crone, with the aid of two soldiers, rushed a machine-gun nest, capturing the gun and gunner. Later in the day he repulsed a heavy counterattack on the hill Cote St. Germaine.

Sergeant, 49th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Under heavy machine-gun fire, he attempted to establish liasion with an adjoining French unit, during which he was killed.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Edna A. Croniu.

Second lieutenant, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

In the face of heavy machine-gun fire, Lieutenant Cronkhite went forward to within hand-grenade range of the enemy lines and brought back to shelter a soldier who had been severely wounded. Later in the day he went out alone and located a dangerous machine-gun nest, which was thereupon destroyed. Although wounded, Lieutenant Cronkhite refused to be evacuated until Oct. 1, when he was ordered to the hospital by the battalion commander.

Sergeant, Company C, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

After his company had passed the first and second lines of the enemy's resistance and when all his company officers and sergeants senior to him had been killed, Sergeant Crosbie, while under a heavy hostile machine-gun fire, which was sweeping his company's position at short range, voluntarily moved from shell hole to shell hole, reorganized a portion of the company, and was killed as he was about to lead the line forward.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Gilbert Crosbie.

Corporal, Battery E, 12th Field Artillery, 2d Division.

Acting as gunner of the second piece, Corporal Cross continued in the service of his piece under heavy hostile shellfire. When the entire gun crew of the first piece was wiped out, at a word from his executive officer he assumed command of the first piece, with a hastily organized crew. He assisted in lifting aside the dead and wounded and continued in the service of the first piece during the barrage until the Infantry had attained their objective.

Second lieutenant, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.

Accompanied by 4 soldiers, Lieutenant Cross made a reconnaissance of the River La Salle, the journey being under constant heavy machine-gun fire. To secure the desired information it was necessary to wade the stream for the entire distance. On the following evening Lieutenant Cross tapped the line from which his regiment would launch their attack, and in the battle that followed he was severely wounded.

Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 325th Infantry, 82d division. After his machine-gun squad had been dispersed by a sweeping enemy fire he continued to operate his gun alone until forced to leave it by the overwhelming enemy attack. He then killed two of the enemy with his pistol, but was severely wounded in the encounter. His nausual bravery and daring contributed materially to the success of his regiment in the action. Private, Company M, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.

After three runners had been killed in attempting to carry a message to an advance platoon through a heavy artillery and machine-gun barrage, he volunteered for the mission and carried the message through.

Sergeant, 18th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. While he was forming an attack a shell hit in the midst of his platoon. Disregarding the heavy counterbarrage, he reorganized his command and led them in attack, continuing for three days, when he was killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John W. Crossen.

Private, Company F, 114th Infantry, 29th Division.

Throughout the six-days' engagement this soldier performed heroic duty in maintaining liaison between regimental and battalion posts of command. He reorganized relay posts, beyond his required route, delivered messages when relays were gone, passing through three barrages to do so, and, although gassed, refused to quit his work.

Private, Company D, 7th Engineers, 5th Division. He crawled forward under fire from machine guns and snipers and killed two Germans who were operating a machine gun in a tree.

Private, first class, Company I, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Private, first class, Crowell carried messages from his company and battalion headquarters over routes swept by heavy artillery fire. Due to the individual gallantry of this runner, communication was maintained during the terrific bombardment which preceded the German attack on the Marne.

Sergeant, Company F, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.

Leaving cover, under heavy machine-gun and shell fire, he visited the outposts in order to assure himself of their security. After accomplishing this mission he fearlessly exposed himself to rescue a wounded comrade, and in so doing lost his life.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. George Crowley.

Sergeant, Company M, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

When the advance of his platoon was checked by perilously heavy machine-gun fire from the direct front, he, after ordering his men to cover, advanced alone and bombed the gun out of action. After successfully leading his platoon to one of the farthermost points of the advance he was killed.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Hannah Crowley.

First Lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He displayed the highest type of courage and leadership. After all the men near him had been killed or wounded, he captured one machine gun and crew unaided, and while attempting to take a second was himself killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Lou Crowther.

First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 126th Infantry, 32d Division. During the attack against Cierges by his regiment he worked continuously and heroically under fire to treat and evacuate the wounded. When the house in which his first-aid station was located was struck by an enemy shell he safely evacuated all of his patients and promptly established another aid station near the front. His untiring efforts and personal bravery saved the lives of many wounded and suffering men and were a source of inspiration to the entire command.

Corporal, Company G, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.
He remained with his commanding officer, who was overcome with gas, and assisted him to a place of safety during a severe bombardment, despite the fact that the officer repeatedly suggested that he leave him and seek safety for himself and that he had previously been instructed, in case of bombardment, to seek shelter in a concrete dugout 1,000 yards in the rear.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, J. B. Cryder.

Private, Company F, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
Shot through both cheeks and the throat, he refused to be evacuated and continued to advance through intense machine-gun fire. Later he fell mortally wounded by a third hullet. His heroic conduct was an inspiration to those near him.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Hannah Cuddy.

Fostindinously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mis. Hamlan Cada,

Private, Machine Gun Company, 370th Infantry, 93d Division.
Private Cuff carried important messages for his regimental commander, constantly exposing himself to heavy artillery and machine-gun fire until he was killed.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Emma Cuff.

Corporal, Company D, 12th Machine Gun Battalion, 4th Division. When two American soldiers attempted to cross an open space and were fired upon by enemy machine guns, one of the soldiers fell wounded, and the enemy concentrated their fire upon the fallen man. Under the enemy machine-gun fire Corporal Cullen rushed forward 75 yards and in spite of the heavy fire carried his wounded comrade to a place of safety.

Corporal, Company K, 364th Infantry, 91st Division.

With six other soldiers he responded to a call for volunteers to go 400 yards beyond the front line to bring in wounded comrades. Under terrific machinegun and shell fire he assisted in the rescue of seven wounded men, also bringing in the dead body of a company lieutenant.

First lieutenant, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

During the advance of his regiment through the Forest of Argonne, France, Lieutenant Cullen led his company, under intense concentration of machinegun fire, to the day's objective, steadying his men and directing the organization and entrenchment of his position. During the period in which part of the regiment was cut off by the enemy he continued to visit his posts and encourage his men under intense concentrations of trench-mortar and ma-chine-gun fire, effectively directing the repulse of attacks on his position. On chine-gun fire, effectively directing the repulse of attacks on ms position. On Oct. 4-6 this officer, observing friendly airplanes, left his shelter and went out into a cleared space in plain view of the enemy and under intense machine-gun fire signaled the position to the airplanes. During all this critical time when his company, as well as the battalion, was entirely without food for 5 days, he displayed coolness, good judgment, and efficiency, furnishing an inspiring example to his men. His gallantry in action contributed materially to the holding of the left flank and the successful resistance made by his battalion.

Lieutenant colonel, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

He distinguished himself by doing more than his duty in disposing front-line troops in effective position, fearlessly subjecting himself to danger in order to accomplish his task and thereby inspiring the officers and men of his brigade to valorous and successful attack.

Sergeant, 49th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
While assisting a wounded man to the rear he was himself wounded in the head, but carried out his mission, succeeding in bringing the other wounded man to the dressing station.

Private, Company C, 314th Infantry, 79th Division.

During an advance Private Culver, though suffering from wounds, carried important messages under heavy shellfire from battalion to company commander, refusing to have his wounds dressed until his mission was completed. He returned after treatment was given and remained at his work as runner, not allowing himself to be evacuated.

Lieutenant colonel, 181st Infantry Brigade, 91st Division.

During the attack on Gesnes he, in addition to performing his regular duties as brigade adjutant, 181st Brigade, went forward with the front line of attack, directing the organization and outposting of the front line after Gesnes and the army objective beyond it had been captured. All of the senior officers of the assaulting regiment having been killed or wounded in the attack on Gesnes, he unhesitatingly organized the scattered elements of the regiment and pushed the attack home to final success.

Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 102d Infantry, 26th Division. He repeatedly volunteered for dangerous missions, carrying messages through violent artillery and machine-gun fires. When a small portion of his organization was cut off by the enemy, he went to their aid alone and with his pistol cleaned out a bombers' nest.

Private, Company F, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
He, single-handed, captured a German machine gun, killing one of the crew and routing the others. He then turned the gun on the enemy with great effectiveness, protecting the right flank of his battalion. Later in the day he volunteered and rescued an outpost of 3 men which was surrounded by the enemy. He performed these missions with great courage, bravery, and initiative, subjected to severe enemy fire throughout the entire exploit Sergeant, Company K, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.

Although seriously wounded during a surprise attack by a German patrol in the vicinity of Hecken, Alsace, on May 27, 1918, he continued to direct his men and succeeded in driving the enemy off. He has since died of injuries sustained.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Augusta Pangburn.

First lieutenant, 116th Infantry, 29th Division. He displayed rare courage in voluntarily going to the assistance of a wounded comrade under heavy machine-gun and shell fire. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, George W. Cunningham.

Captain, 15th Field Artillery, 2d Division.

During this period, Captain Cunningham, with utter disregard for bis personal danger, on numerous occasions exposed himself to the enemy fire while reconnoitering and performing liaison work. On Sept. 17, while at his post as liaison officer with the most advanced Infantry unit, he was killed by an enemy shell.

He successfully returned with the ammunition, thereby greatly assisting his company to hold its position. He was severely wounded near Brieulles while making a gallant stand against the enemy with 12 other men, the only survivors of his platoon

Private, Company F, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.

Private Curry voluntarily took up an abandoned automatic rifle and with one man moved to an exposed flank and opened a continuous harassing fire on the advancing enemy. Although exposed to direct fire, Private Curry kept his gun in action until an Infantry platoon could take up a better

Private, Company F, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.

Private Curti, a litter bearer, went out alone in front of the lines several times under the severest of fire and carried back wounded men from an exposed area, from which his company had been forced to withdraw.

Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
The attacking Infantry having been temporarily halted by machine-gun fre from the front, Sergeant Curtin, grasping the situation, led a group of men in a flank attack upon the enemy machine-gun position, which resulted in the capture of the position and 30 prisoners. His deed enabled the left of the line to advance to its objective.

Corporal, Company G, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
Corporal Curtis courageously continued to lead his squad against the enemy after being painfully wounded in the face by shell fragments, refusing to obtain first aid in order not to delay the advance of his squad.

First sergeant, Company G, 16th Infantry, 1st Division. Leading his platoon against an enemy battery in the face of direct fire, he personally killed the gunner and, with the aid of his men, either killed or wounded the entire crew, thus preventing further casualties on his troops.

Private, Company B, 59th Infantry, 4th Division.
Advancing alone across open territory and exposed to extremely heavy machinegun fire, he rescued a fellow soldier who was lying wounded beyond the front line. He accomplished his mission, even after being painfully wounded in the head during his return.

First lieutenant, pilot, 95th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

Captain, 360th Infantry, 90th Division.
After his company had reached its objective and was under a terrific hostile artillery and machine-gun fire which caused the loss of 10 killed and 25 wounded in a short time. Captain Curtiss diplayed conspicuous bravery by exposing himself to a heavy shelling while going forward and bringing to shelter one of his men who had been wounded and was unable to move.

Corporal, Company L, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
Voluntarily leaving shelter, he led a patrol of 3 men across an open field under heavy shell fire and captured an enemy machine gun, killing 2 and capturing 1 of the crew.

First sergeant. Company A, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
During the advance near Reddy Farm, Sergeant Curtis, then a platoon commander, was painfully wounded in the leg, but refused to be evacuated until wounded a second time. During the advance the battalion commander asked for a volunteer to establish liaison with the unit on the right. Sergeant Curtis immediately offered his services for this hazardous mission. On Oct. 9, near Gesnes, when the only officer in his company was killed, he took command, leading the company through an intense enemy barrage. Although wounded and knocked down by the explosion of a shell, he continued to lead the company until relieved.

Private, Company M, 142d Infantry, 36th Division.

While passing through a heavy enemy barrage he was mortally wounded, but continued to advance, encouraging his comrades to follow him. His example of courage and fearlessness gave confidence to his comrades and the advance was successful. He later died of his wounds.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, H. V. Curtis.

Sergeant, Battery C, 7th Field Artillery, 1st Division.

He volunteered and took his piece and gun squad forward to the infantry first lines, where he was subjected to violent bombardment. He refused to take shelter until nearly all his horses and three of his men were wounded, and then left shelter no less than five times to rescue wounded comrades, this being done under a heavy barrage.

Private, Company D, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.
Under terrific machine-gun, artillery, and rifle fire he displayed great courage in locating and fighting enemy machine gunners. He was killed while rushing a machine-gun nest Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Nelson J. Cushion.

Corporal, Company C, 103d Infantry, 26th Division. In the advance of the first wave, east from Belleau Woods, he cleaned out, single handed, a dugout of German machine guns.

Corporal, Company I, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

Although suffering from wounds, he went forth under treacherous enemy fire and dragged two wounded comrades to safety. Later the same day he organized a stretcher party and brought in 3 wounded comrades under machine-gun fire, which was so severe that it had stopped the advance of paighboring trens. neighboring troops.

First lieutenant, observer, 90th Aero Squadron, Air Service. Responding to an urgent request for a plane to penetrate the enemy lines to ascertain whether or not the enemy was preparing a counterattack, Lieutenant Cutter immediately volunteered for the mission. Obliged to fly at a very low altitude on account of the unfavorable weather conditions, he was under terrific fire of the enemy at all times, but by skillful dodging he managed to cross the enemy lines. His plane was seen to suddenly lurch and crash the short distance to the ground, both he and his pilot being killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Mary S. Cutter.

Private, Company B, 348th Machine Gun Battalion, 91st Division.
Throughout 5 days of action Private Dabney maintained liaison between Private, Company A, 1st Engineers, 1st Division.

On 2 occasions, when intense machine-gun fire threatened his platoon, Private Daley voluntarily accompanied another soldier and attacked the enemy positions in the face of heavy fire, silencing the guns by effective rifle fire.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 360th Infantry, 90th Division.

Although his arm was shattered by a machine-gun bullet he refused to go to the rear, but continued to advance under extremely heavy machine-gun fire until he received 2 more wounds, 1 piercing his leg and making it impossible for him to advance farther. While crawling to the rear he encountered another wounded man and assisted him to the dressing station.

Sergeant, first class, Company A, 1st Engineers, 1st Division.

He displayed heroic devotion to duty by rendering first-aid assistance to the wounded, by handling his platoon under shellfire with coolness and courage, and by attempting to protect a comrade while he himself was mortally wounded.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Asa C. Dalrymple.

Private, Company G, 26th Infantry, 1st Division. He crawled to an enemy sniper's post and killed or wounded all its occupants.

Bugler, Company M, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.

Bugler Dalton and an officer were making a reconnaissance of Bois-de-Malaumont. Upon entering the woods they were suddenly fired upon by machine guns. Together they rushed the machine gun. The officer was wounded and unable to take cover. Bugler Dalton ran across an open space, exposing himself to short range of machine-gun fire, and carried the officer to a position of eafort. of safety.

First sergeant, 73d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Sergeant Daly repeatedly performed deeds of heroism and great service on June 5, 1918. At the risk of his life he extinguished a fire in an ammunition dump at Lucy-le-Bocage. On June 7, 1918, while his position was under violent bombardment, he visited all the gun crews of his company, then posted over a wide portion of the front, to cheer his men. On June 10, 1918, he attacked an enemy machine-gun emplacement unassisted and captured it by use of hand grenades and his automatic pistol. On the same day, during the German attack on Baurschles, he brought in wounded under fire. the German attack on Bouresches, he brought in wounded under fire.

First lieutenant, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.

Although wounded, he took command of the first battalion of his regiment after the previous battalion commanders had been wounded, displaying the highest courage in advancing and holding the objective of his battalion. Three days later he was again wounded, but remained with his command until he was ordered to the rear by his regimental commander.

Private, first class, Company B, 116th Infantry, 29th Division. He crawled from his own trenches to within range of an enemy machine-gun nest, which had been harassing his company all day, and hombed out the gunners with hand grenades, thereby enabling his company to occupy a more advantageous position.

Private, Battery A, 10th Field Artillery, 3d Division. Herepeatedly volunteered and carried important messages 4 kilometers through heavy shellfire near the enemy lines. On one trip he found a wounded soldier and carried him through an enemy barrage to the dressing station.

Private, Company G, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
When enemy sniper and machine-gun fire had held up his line and caused many casualties in his ranks Private Daniel went forward a distance of about 150 yards and with the aid of his machine gun put an enemy nest out of action and killed one of the snipers.

Sergeant, Company E, 16th Infantry, 1st Division. He voluntarily and alone advanced against a machine gun and captured the gun and its crew.

Lieutenant Danzig repeatedly crossed open spaces swept by shellfire during a violent barrage to inspect the gun positions of his platoon. He established his post of command at an exposed position under artillery fire, encouraging his men and looking after their safety. Later in the day he took charge of the guns of an officer who had been wounded and placed them in new positions. On July 26 he advanced through a heavy barrage on a reconnaissance and placed four guns in support of a battalion of infantry. After the infantry had withdrawn he held this position under enemy fire from the rear and flanks until ordered to withdraw the following night. until ordered to withdraw the following night

Private, first class, Company B, 165th Infantry, 42d Division. Exposing himself to intense enemy fire and with complete disregard for his own safety, he made his way under observation of the enemy to within a short distance of their lines, rescued a wounded soldier, whom he carried a distance of 300 yards to a position of comparative safety, in broad daylight and at all times under observation of the enemy. The superb courage and soldierly devotion to duty thus displayed greatly inspired the men of the regiment.

These four men were prominent in the attack on enemy machine-gun positions in the Bois-de-Belleau on June 6 and 8, 1918, were foremost in their company at all times, and acquitted themselves with such distinction that they were an example for the remainder of their command.

Sergeant, Company K, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.

During the fighting in the Argonne, Oct. 4-13, Sergeant Darkoski displayed extraordinary heroism and ability in leading his platoon against strong points under the most severe shell and machine-gun fire. On Oct. 9, in a hand-tohand fight, he alone captured two enemy guns.

Second lieutenant, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.

Exposed to heavy machine-gun fire from the front and right flank, he led his platoon forward through heavy brush, although suffering heavy casualties. During the advance he and one other member of his platoon attacked a machine-gun nest and captured three machine guns and five prisoners. In hand-to-hand fighting he personally killed five Germans and wounded others.

Private, Headquarters Company, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.
During the entire period, July 26 to Aug. 1, 1918, in action northeast of Chateau-Thierry, France, he carried messages between the firing line and battalion headquarters through heavy enemy shellfire. On returning from the firing line he would pick up a severely wounded man each time and carry him through the barrage to a first-aid section. He finally became so exhausted he carried to the carrier by the part of the part of the carrier by the section of the carrier by the section of the carrier by the part of the par through the barrage to a list-and section. The tharty became so exhausted be could not continue his work, yet he had to be ordered to report to the aid section for treatment. During the whole series of engagements he did not sleep and taxed his physical endurance to the utmost at all times, setting to his comrades an example of utter disregard of danger and exceptional devotion to duty.

Sergeant, Company F, 130th Infantry, 33d Division.

While on a daylight patrol he displayed exceptional bravery, when with one other man he fought a large force of the enemy, killing a German officer and two machine gunners who were attempting to put their guns in action. Surrounded by the enemy, he capture a German corporal and fought his way out with his pistol, not having time to load his rifle. Major, Infantry, General Staff Corps, Assistant Chief of Staff, 35th Division. After exposure to severe shelling and machine-run fire for three days, during which time he displayed rare courage and devotion to duty, Major Davis, then adjutant, Sixty-minth Infantry Brigade, voluntarily and in the face of intense enemy machine-gun and artillery fire proceeded to various points in his brigade sector, assisted in reorganizing positions, and in replacing units of the brigade, this self-imposed duty necessitating continued exposure to concentrated enemy fire. Sept. 30, 1918, learning that a strong counterattack had been launched by the enemy against Baulny Ridge and was progressing successfully, he voluntarily organized such special duty men as could be found and with them rushed forward to reinforce the line under attack, exposing himself with such coolness and great courage that his conduct inspired the troops in this crisis and enabled them to hold on in the face of vastly superior numbers. numbers.

Sergeant, Company II, 61st Infantry, 5th Division.

He voluntarily advanced alone against an enemy machine gun which was holding up his platoon, capturing 4 prisoners and the gun. Later he led a few men into a dugout and captured 13 prisoners. He then continued the advance until the day's objective was reached and the platoon position organized.

First lieutenant, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.

He successfully held a trench several hundred yards in advance of the Hindenburg line, under heavy shell and machine-gun fire, with a detachment which he had organized with men from different organizations. The following morning he led his detachment still farther, cleaning up about 500 yards of enemy trenches.

Corporal, Company F, 359th Infantry, 90th Division.

After his platoon sergeant had become a casualty he assumed command and led his men with marked personal bravery and skill, advancing under fire until he was mortally wounded. His example inspired his men with his own fighting spirit.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Charity Davis.

Corporal, Company D, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.
While the advance of his platoon was being held up by deadly enfilleding fire of the enemy, he voluntarily rushed over open ground, through direct machine-gun fire, for a distance of over 100 meters, and, with the aid of his bayonet attacked the nest. He killed both of the gunners, thereby silencing the fire but during the combat he himself was severly wounded. It was due to his prompt and fearless action that further advance of his platoon was made possible.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Lena Marz.

Private, first class, Company II, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.

Although wounded, he courageously led several attacks against machine-gun emplacements. While reconnoitering from an exposed position in front of the lines he was wounded a second time by a sniper, but refused to go to the rear until ordered to do so.

Private, Company I, 113th Infantry, 29th Division.

On duty as a company runner, he was accompanying the left assault platoon of his company during the advance through the woods, when it was fired on by an enemy machine gun. As soon as the gun opened fire the members of the platoon scattered and attempted to flank the gun, but Private Davis pushed on shead, being the first to reach the nest, attacked it single handed, and killed the four enemy gunners. His gallant act enabled his platoon to continue the advance. continue the advance.

Bugler, Company C, 124th Machine Gun Battalion, 33d Division.
When his platoon and the infantry company to which it was attached were held up by hostile obstructions and machine-gun fire he volunteered and carried a message to the left flank of the company. A few minutes afterwards he again distinguished himself by leaving the cover of a trench, going forward under heavy machine-gun fire, and helping rescue a wounded officer.

First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 12th Sherwood Foresters, British Army. He entered a dugout which had been caved in by enemy shell fire and ministered to the wounded. Although the dugout was under heavy shellfire, he per-formed an operation for amputation of a leg and thereby saved a soldier's life.

First lieutenant, 103d Field Artillery, 26th Division.
Lieutenant Davis kept his battery in action during a heavy destructive enemy bombardment which lasted for several hours. Although almost half his detachment were killed or wounded and three of his gnns put out of action, he personally directed the fire of his remaining gun. Later, while assisting a wounded officer to safety through a shell-swept area, a shell exploded near them, killing the wounded officer and knocking Lieutenant Davis to the ground. After the loss of all his officers, and his company was becoming disorganized, he took command and reassembled the company, bringing it to the objective at the most opportune moment. He commanded for a period of 11 days thereafter and successfully continued the operations by his leadership and exceptional courage under fire.

Sergeant, sanitary detachment, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.
He volunteered to go out into a field swept by artillery and machine-gun fire to administer first aid to wounded soldiers, constantly exposing himself to fire. His work saved the lives of many soldiers. After dark, when it was possible to remove the wounded from the field, he worked tirelessly during their evacuation to the first-aid station.

First lieutenant, 94th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
While on a voluntary patrol, he encountered seven enemy monoplace planes at an altitude of 2,000 meters. After a brief engagement his guns jammed, but, after repairing the jam in the air and under heavy fire, he returned to the fight, shot down one of the enemy in flames and drove off the others. Oak-leaf cluster.

For the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near Clery-le-Petit, France, Nov. 4, 1918, Lieutenant Dawson is awarded an oak-leaf cluster. Sighting four enemy planes (type, Rumpler), he immediately attacked, despite the numerical superiority of the enemy, and destroyed one of the group, whereupon the remaining three scattered and returned to their lines. 1918.

Private, first class, Company C, 58th Infantry, 4th Division.
Private Day repeatedly volunteered and carried messages from his company in the front line across an open field swept by enemy machine-gun and sniper fire to the buttalion post of command. He also voluntarily made trips across this dangerous area for the purpose of filling canteens for wounded soldiers and securing stratebers. and securing stretchers.

Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.

Sergeant, Headquarers Company, 163d Infantry, 26601 Division.

Displaying remarkable coolness and courage, Sergeant Day volunteered and, with one other man, at about midnight and under a heavy enemy artillery and machine-gun fire erawled through and over several wire entanglements to a point well within the hostile machine-gun outpost line, where they cut several meters from the armored cable which supplied electric current to the enemy's wire entanglements which were an impediment and danger to our reconnoitering patrols.

First lieutenant, 107th Field Artillery, 28th Division.

Hist neutenant, 10/th Field Arthlery, 28th Division.

He led a patrol out to the Infantry lines in order to adjust the artillery fire on machine guns which were holding up the advance. It was found necessary to advance about half a mile beyond the front lines across open ground swept by machine-gun fire; but, undaunted, this officer continued on for a half hour, until he established telephone communication with his regiment. Having finished his work he helped to carry a wounded officer back through the content of the content an enemy barrage safely to our lines.

Mechanic, Company A, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.

Mechanic Deakins voluntarily proceeded with four other men the distance of about 400 yards in advance of our line and attacked a superior force of the enemy who were attempting to man a machine gun in a disabled French tank. Due to this bold attack the enemy was driven off and the tank retaken. Company A, 18th Infantry, was thereby enabled to continue the advance with slight loss.

Sergeant, Company II, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.

Although wounded in the lung by a machine-gun bullet, he refused to be evacuated. Upon his platoon reaching its objective, he consolidated the new position and repulsed a strong counterattack with heavy losses, to the enemy. He then reported to his battalion commander, refusing a litter, saying that all effectives were needed in the line, and walked to the dressing

Corporal, Company D, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

During the operations against the Hindenburg line Corporal Dean, with four other soldiers, left shelter and went forward into an open field under heavy shell and machine-gun fire, and succeeded in bandaging and carrying back to our lines two wounded men.

Second lieutenant, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
Detailed in command of a carrying party on May 28, 1918, near Cantigny, France, he bravely proceeded under fire to execute his mission, and by his example of bravery heartened his men, who were under fire for the first time.
On May 29, 1918, he took his party through heavy shelling to carry ammunition to the front lines without being ordered to do so.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. J. L. Dearing.

Private, Company F, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.

Acting on his own initiative, he advanced alone against a machine-gun nest that had been causing heavy casualties among his comrades. He crawled to within a short distance of the enemy position before he was detected. He then rushed the post and bayoneted the three gunners, being himself killed in the company to t in the encounter Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, James Deasey.

Sergeant, Company D, 31st Infantry.

He led a patrol of eight men through enemy country to Kazanka, about 10 miles distant from camp, and returned with an accurate report of enemy activities in the town. The circumstances governing at the time required extraordinary daring and skill on the part of Sergeant De Battista in order to carry out the instructions given him.

Private, Company H, 115th Infantry, 29th Division.

In the Bois de Consenvoye, east of the Meuse, he, acting in the capacity of runner, carried three successive messages through continuous and heavy barrages of both our own and the enemy's artillery, traversing a path where two men had previously been killed by the same barrage.

Bugler, Company G, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
Bugler Decaire, acting as runner to battalion headquarters, continued in the advance and performed his duties under extremely heavy shell and machinegun fire after he had been very severely wounded in the knee.

Corporal, Company F, 60th Infantry, 5th Division. In order to deliver a message from the regimental headquarters to the attacking battalion with all the speed possible, he crossed an open area under continuous machine-gun fire. Although painfully wounded while traversing this open stretch of 500 meters, he successfully delivered the message.

Captain, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Commanding a detachment of about 60 men in the rear of the attacking battalion.

Captain De Carre continued forward alone, after the advance battalion had swerved to the right. About 150 yards distant he encountered deadly enemy machine-gun fire, but he continued on, capturing two guns. He then brought up his detachment and by exceptional handling effected the capture of an entire machine-gun company, consisting of three officers and 169 men. His effort prevented the enemy from firing on our troops from the rear.

Second lieutenant, pilot, 1st Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Because of intense aerial activity on the opening day of the St. Mihiel offensive, Lieutenant De Castro, pilot, and First Lieutenant Arthur E. Easterbrook, observer, volunteered to fly over the enemy's lines on a photographic mission, without the usual protection of accompanying battle planes. Notwithstanding low-hanging clouds, which necessitated operation at an altitude of only 400 meters, they penatrated 4 kilometers beyond the German lines. Attacked by four enemy machines, they fought their foes, completed their photographic mission, and returned safely.

First lieutenant, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
When the attacking battalion had been held up by machine-gun fire, Lieutenant Dechert, who was on duty as regimental signal officer, personally carried wire across an open field in full view of the enemy and established a telephone station within 200 yards of the front line. He then went forward under heavy shell fire to report to the pattalion commander, and returning to the telephone least it is received. kept it in operation for 24 hours under intense artillery and machine-gun fire.

First lieutenant, Infantry, aid-de-camp, 77th Division.

In preparation for an attack by units of his division, Lieutenant De Coppet helped establish an observation post. Learning a wounded officer was in front, he made his way twice through intense fire from artillery and small arms to where the wounded officer lay, and assisted in carrying him back to set the content of the co

Sergeant, Company B, 101st Infantry, 26th Division. During the advance of his battalion at Molleville Farm, Sergeant De Cota was rendered unconscious and wounded by the explesion of a shell. Recovering his senses, he quickly rejoined his platoon and led it during the attack. Although suffering from a painful wound in the arm, he remained on duty until ordered to the rear by his company commander late the next day.

Sergeant, Company I, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
When the advance of his platoon had been held up by direct machine-gun fire, he, severely wounded during the advance, went out in plain view of the enemy, pulled the pin of a grenade with his teeth, and, throwing the bomb with his left arm, put the gun and its crew out of action.

Private, Company B, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.

While working as a stretcher bearer, Private Deeringer was himself severely wounded, but he nevertheless succeeded in getting his patient to the dressing station, where he himself received first aid and was tagged for evacuation. Tearing the tag from his coat, he returned to the field and continued to perform his duties until afternoon, when he was hardly able to walk, and was again ordered to the rear.

First lieutenant, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.
Although wounded, Lieutenant Decse led his platoon against enemy machine gun nests, silencing them. He made his way through a heavy barrage, encountering and breaking an enemy counterattack. Progressing slowly and with great difficulty on account of the deadly fire, he reached a strongly fortified position of the enemy, where he captured many prisoners and machine guns, which he defended until the arrival of support. During the action he was again wounded, the effects of which caused his death.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, S. S. Deese.

Corporal, Company M, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
Although wounded three times in the attack at Cantigny, France, May 28, 1918, he showed conspicuous bravery in assisting to capture a machine gun which was causing heavy Josses. Although nearly exhausted, he captured three prisoners and made them secure before accepting attention to his injuries.

Private, Company E, 56th Infantry, 7th Division.

During an enemy counterattack the dugout in which he and his companions were taking shelter was surrounded by a group of the enemy, who were demanding surrender. Jumping to the fire step and with the aid of a rifle, Private Deggs killed four of the enemy and caused the rest to flee in confusion. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Julia Deggs.

First lieutenant, 165th Infantry, 42d Division. russ neutenant, total mantry, 424 Division.

After having been knocked down and severely wounded in the leg by an exploding shell at about 7 o'clock a.m., and although suffering great pain and much weakened by loss of blood, he refused to leave his platoon, but remained on duty therewith under heavy enemy fire until about 11 o'clock a.m., when relieved by another officer. As a member of a gun crew Private De Laite kept his gun in action during heavy enemy bombardment. When 3 shells exploded among the gun crew, killing or wounding all of them, Private De Laite, although fatally wounded, disregarded his own wounds and went to obtain aid for his wounded comrades.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Fred De Laite.

Private, Company M, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.

When his company was held up by machine-gun fire Private Delambo, with 2 comrades, advanced and made a flank attack on an enemy machine-gun position, capturing the gun and forcing 1 officer, 2 sergeants, and 6 privates to surrender. By his deed the company was enabled to continue the advance.

First lieutenant, 340th Field Artillery, 89th Division.
Assisted by a soldier, he went forward in advance of the Infantry to lay telephone wires. Nearing Marimbois Farm they found the place occupied by the enemy. Armed with land grenades he advanced on a dugout, where he routed out 17 of the enemy, bringing them back to our lines in the midst of a severe shell and machine-gun fire.

Captain, 360th Infantry, 90th Division.
Wounded while leading his company in the advance he turned over the command to another officer and went to the rear for first aid. Upon reaching the aid station he learned that his company was without officers, whereupon he immediately started back to the front through heavy machine-gun fire and was killed on the way.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Anna McKee.

Private, first class, Company L, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

With great daring and utter disregard for his own safety he made 3 hazardous journeys from his company command post to the battalion ammunition dump through the Bois-de-Remoirre, which was infested with enemy machinegun nests and snipers. Twice he was driven off by pistol and grenade fire which he returned, and the third time forced to abandon further attempts when the dump was destroyed by enemy fire. Using the top of a dugout as a parapet he, with a few men of his company, engaged the enemy and with pistols and grenades alone kept the enemy from the company post of command. Finally Private Delesdernier, running through a terrific barrage of enemy fire, carried a message to the company support, accomplished his mission, and again returned through the enemy barrage to the defense of his company's headquarters. company's headquarters.

First lieutenant, 4th Engiueers, 4th Division.
He was in command of a detachment of Engineers engaged in constructing an artillery bridge across the River Vesle under constant fire from machine guns and bombardment by both high-explosive and gas shells. Although he was suffering from the effects of gas this officer remained in charge of the party, directing the work and furnishing his men a splendid example of courage under fire and disregard for personal safety.

First lieutenant, 106th Infantry, 27th Division. Lieutenant de Loiselle twice voluntarily went forward under heavy shell and machine-gun fire to reconnoiter the enemy positions. While leading the second of these patrols the officer who accompanied him was killed. Notwithstanding, with but one other man, he continued in his reconnaissance until almost surrounded by the enemy. He succeeded in outmaneuvering the enemy and returned with valuable information.

Sergeant, Company K, 311th Infantry, 78th Division.

Corporal, Company D, 354th Infantry, 89th Division. He took command of the 4 leading combat groups after 4 other leaders had been disabled, directing them with such skill and coolness that many machine guns were taken from the enemy. Four hours before the day's objective had been reached his shoulder was pierced by a machine-gun bullet, but he told no one of the wound until his line had been organized along the objective.

Corporal, Company G, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
With the assistance of an Australian soldier, Corporal de Smidt crept up on the position of an enemy machine gun, captured the gun, and forced its crew to earry it back to our lines.

Commander, surgeon, U. S. Navy, attached to Headquarters, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

He organized the service of caring for and evacuating the wounded in a most systematic and admirable manner, constantly exposing himself to the enemy, displaying extraordinary heroism, coolness, and energy.

Private, Company B, 47th Infantry, 4th Division.

After all the officers and noncommissioned officers of his platoon had been lost. Private Detrew assumed command of the plateon, successfully leading it from its critical situation to the objective, through terrific machine-gun and shellfire. He performed this gallant act without any previous instructions or orders, and acted entirely upon his own initiative.

Posthumeusly awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. J. W. Detrow.

Chaplain, 104th Infantry, 26th Division.

Chaplain DeValles repeatedly exposed himself to heavy artillery and machinegun fire in order to assist in the removal of the wounded from exposed points in advance of the lines. He worked for long periods of time with stretcher bearers in carrying wounded men to safety. Chaplain DeValles previously rendered gallant service in the Chemin des Dames sector, Mar. 11, 1918, by remaining with a group of wounded during a heavy enemy bombardment.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Mrs. Marie Hill.

Sergeant, Company C, 115th Machine Gun Battalien, 30th Division. Sergeant, Company C, 115th Machine Gun Battalion, 30th Division.

Upon learning that several members of his platoon had been wounded by enemy shellfire, he immediately left his dugout and went to their assistance. After carrying one man to shelter and being knocked down by a bursting shell in so doing, he returned to the shelled area and helped carry the rest of the wounded men to the dressing station, 500 yards away, across a field which was being heavily bombarded with gas and high-explosive shells.

Private, Company M, 125th Infautry, 32d Division.
When his company had crossed the River Ourcq and captured the Bois Pelger, the corporal of his squad, fighting beside him, was wounded by machine-gun fire. The enemy continued to fire on the wounded man, and Private Devereaux, single handed, with the fire of his rille, attacked the machine gun and succeeded in putting it out of action.

Private, first class, 43d Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps. 2d Division.

He demonstrated the highest degree of courage by offering his services in bringing the wounded to a place of safety from a region which was under constant shell and machine-gun fire.

Captain, Medical Corps, sanitary detachment, 112th Machine Gun Battalion, 29th Division.

Upon being notified that an enemy shell had struck a dugout occupied by the brigade radio detachment he ran to the aid of the buried men and worked tirelessly to rescue them. Despite the fact that numerous gas and highexplosive shells were falling in the vicinity, he continued his efforts until he was certain that the three men remaining in the ruined dugout were dead.

Private, Company A, 103d Engineers, 28th Division. On four different occasions during the night of July 16 he volunteered and under heavy shell and machine-gun fire successfully rescued wounded comrades.

Sergeant, Company I, 59th Infantry, 4th Division. When one of his men was wounded and his clothing and bandoleer of ammunition caught fire, he cried for help, and Sergeant Dietz left a place of safety and regardless of his personal safety went through intense machine-gun fire and rescued him.

Private, first class, 314th Engineers, 89th Division.

Private Dietz accompanied an officer on a reconnaissance of the bridge at Pouilly and the road from Pouilly to Inor. Successfully reaching the river, he crossed, an act which had not been done by any troops previously. Recrossing under heavy enemy fire, he made his way to Pouilly, collecting on the way most valuable information and data for engineer work. Just as they approached their destination he was wounded, the officer with him being killed. When darkness set in, he returned and supplied most valuable information regarding the reconnaissance.

Sergeant, Company D, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.
Sergeant Diggins, together with Private Ivor Griudle, climbed out of a trench in the face of severe shrapnel and machine-run fire, proceeded 150 yards across an open space to the aid of a wounded officer, and dressed his wounds.

Private, first class, Company M, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
Private Diggs volunteered and successfully carried a message through heavy shell and machine-gan fire in plain view of the enemy after one runner had been killed and two others wounded in attempting to accomplish this mission. Though he was gassed in performing this feat, he refused to seek first aid until he was wounded later in the afternoon.

Private, Company G, 371st Infantry, 93d Division.
After his company had been forced to withdraw from an advanced position under severe machine-gun and artillery fire, this soldier went forward and rescued wounded soldiers, working persistently until all of them had been carried to shelter.

Private, Company F, 145th Infantry, 37th Division.
He was one of four men who successfully held a small advanced post against a raid of 80 of the enemy. Two of the defenders were killed, but the staunch work of the others drove off the raiders. He engaged in a hand-to-hand encounter with the assailants with hand grenades and his rifle.

Private, Company I, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.

Private Dilbeck accompanied Lieutenant Murphy and three other soldiers in a flank attack on three heavy machine guns. Fired on directly at 30 yards, they charged the guns, and in the hand-to-hand fight which followed this soldier and two of his counrades were killed.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, William Dilbeck.

Private, Company C, 15th Machine Gun Battalion, 5th Division.

Second lieutenant, 26th Infantry, 1st Division. He carried his platoon forward in four attacks and took all objectives assigned to him.

Sergeant, Company C, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

After being wounded he refused to go to the rear, but volunteered to act as a runner and repeatedly earried messages through the enemy barrage. Later the same day he voluntarily joined a platoon and fought with it in a successful attack against the enemy's line.

First lieutenant, pilot, 24th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

First licutemant, pilot, 24th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

He exhibited courage in the course of a long and dangerous photographic and visual reconnaissance in the region of Mezieres with two other planes of the 24th Aero Squadron. Their formation was broken by the attack of 10 enemy pursuit planes. Five enemy planes attacked Licutemant Dillon and his observer, who succeeded in shooting down two of these out of control. They then had a clear passage to their own lines, but turned back into Germany to assist a friendly plane with several hostile aircraft attacking it. They succeeded in shooting down one more of the enemy.

Private, Company A, 39th Infantry, 4th Division.

After his squad leader had become a casualty, he assumed command and led his men against machine-gun nests, materially assisting in the capture of two guns and prisoners. He was killed in the performance of duty.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Helga Dilworth.

Sergeant, Company F, 326th Infantry, 82d Division.
During the advance of his battalion, and at a time when the concentrated fire of the enemy had caused numerous casualties in our ranks, Sergeant Dion not only reorganized his own platoon, but assisted in reforming others after the leaders had been lost. He was selected as patrol leader to gain contact with the enemy, and, although painfully wounded and nearly exhausted from loss of blood, he continued on. After having his wound dressed he insisted on returning to complete his mission.

Private, Company C, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

He displayed extraordinary heroism in defending his post during the Seicheprey engagement on the morning of Apr. 20, 1918. Although completely surrounded by the enemy on several occasions, he fought them off with grenades and rifle fire, finally succeeding in driving them away, after which he carried a wounded comrade through a rain of shrapnel to a first-aid station and returned to his post.

Private, Company G, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.

Private, Company G, 315th Infantry, 78th Division.

He volunteered and reconnoitered in front of the first-line battalion to secure information regarding enemy machine guns and minenwerfers which had checked the advace of his organization. He was wounded by a sniper's bullet as he crawled back from this reconnaissance, but refused to submit to first aid. until he made his report to the battalion commander and informed his men of the enemy's position.

Corporal, 55th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Mariue Corps, 2d Division. Killed in action at Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he gave the supreme proof of that extraordinary heroism which will serve as an example to hitherto untried troops.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Joseph Dock.

Major, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
While the attacking first wave was halted by machine-gun fire, Major Dodd crossed the line and, getting in front of it, located the direction from which the fire was coming. He then directed a flanking fire on the stronghold and so encouraged his men that the attack was renewed. His great bravery resulted in a highly successful attack, during which many of the enemy were killed and captured and a lorge number of our men recovered who had been taken prisoners earlier in the day.

Corporal, Company H, 53d Infantry, 6th Division. Corporal, Company 11, 53d Inlantry, 6th Division.

He was in a detachment of 50 solders who were attacked by a raiding party of the enemy composed of 300 storm troops. Though severely wounded by shell-fire and grenades during the combat, this courageous soldier continued to operate his automatic rifle until the enemy retreated. The fire of the rifle which he was manning alone dispersed the main body of the enemy and prevented them from capturing prisoners and gaining valuable information.

Private, first class, sanitary detachment, 104th Intantry, 26th Division. He displayed conspicuous gallantry during the action of Apr. 10, 1918, in running through beavily shelled area to rescue an officer who had fallen mortally wounded and at great personal risk carrying him to dressing station.

Private, 148th Ambulance Company, 112th Sanitary Train, 37th Division. With 2 other soldiers, Private Donaldson volunteered to rescue 2 wounded men who had been lying in an exposed position on the opposite bank of the Scheldt River for 2 days. Making 2 trips across the stream, in the face of heavy machine-gun and shell fire, he and his companions succeeded in carrying both the wounded men to shelter.

First sergeant, Company G, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
As liaison sergeant he showed conspicuous bravery and good judgment at Soissons, France, July 19, 1918, when the loss of his captain threatened the success of the company's operations. He maintained communication and went forward on 4 attacks under heavy fire.

Wagoner, Company B, 6th Engineers, 3d Division. He placed himself in a most exposed position under direct observation of the enemy to cover the attempted rescue of a wounded comrade, maintaining his position until the party returned.

Sergeant, Company D, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
He was sent out on a patrol to investigate machine-gun fire from the left flank and to the rear of his company's position, and was wounded in the left leg by shrapnel fragments. Upon reporting back to his company commander he refused to be evacuated, but insisted in taking an active and gallant part in 4 subsequent attacks made to reach a battalion of our troops who were cut off and surrounded by a superior force of the enemy.

Corporal, medical detachment, 312th Infantry, 78th Division. In the face of heavy shell and machine-gun fire and continuous gas attacks, he established and maintained for four days a dressing station in a most advanced position. When an enemy attack scened imminent, he refused to retire to safety, but remained at his post, being relieved after his comrades advanced.

Private, Company I., 356th Infantry, 89th Division.
Participating in the first reconnaissance of the damaged bridges at Pouilly, with 2 others, he advanced more than 500 meters beyond the American outposts, crossing 3 branches of the Meuse River and successfully encountering the enemy.

Private, Headquarters Company, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
Private Donovan, while exposed to machine-gun and artillery fire, went forward and killed an enemy sniper. Later, while moving forward to the attack, he entered single handed a dugout and captured five of the enemy.

Majer, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
When a patrol in charge of a wounded officer was entirely cut off by machinegun and artillery fire, he displayed great bravery by voluntarily carrying a message over ground swept by machine guns and later leading a rescuing party to the position.

First lieutenant, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
Displaying conspicuous leadership, he led his platoon against an enemy battery while it was in action. Through his skillful maneuvering 42 prisoners, 10 pieces of artillery, and 5 machine guns were captured.

Regimental sorgeant major, Headquarters Company, 30th Infantry, 3d Division. He constantly exposed himself to shellfire while receiving messages from runners and in giving directions to them. He also frequently removed his gas mask to make himself more clearly understood, and encourage the runners by his example.

Private, Company C, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.

As a stretcher bearer Private Doughty displayed exceptional courage in removing wounded men from a field swept by enemy machine-gun fire of such intensity that 5 other soldiers engaged in this work were killed and another wounded.

First lieutenant, 142d Infantry, 36th Division. Lieutenant, 142d Inlantry, 36th Division.

Lieutenant Douglas was a member of a patrol consisting of himself, another officer, and 3 soldiers, which came under fire from an enemy machine-gun nest. Leading the patrol forward by short rushes to within a short distance of the enemy position, he had his companions take cover, while he continued on alone in full view of the enemy, and by accurate fire from an automatic rifle at a range of 40 yards silenced the nest, capturing 20 men and 4 machine guns. 4 machine guns.

Private, Company C, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.

Hearing cries of distress from a disabled tank, he assisted an officer by advancing in the face of terrific machine-gun and shell fire to the spot. Notwithstanding the fact that the tank was subjected to point-blank fire of artillery, he succeeded in rescuing the badly wounded tank commander and removing him to allow a factor. him to a place of safety.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Otis R. Douglas.

Sergeant, Company I, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.

On Oct. 15 Sergeant Douglas led his platoon against a strong machine-gun nest in the open field east of the Bois-de-Pultier, capturing about 20 prisoners, with very few casualties in his own platoon. On Nov. 5 he led his platoon across the Meuse in the face of heavy machine-gun, rifle, and artillery fire and successfully cleared the heights east of the river of strong enemy machine-gun registrate. positions.

First lieutenant, 113th Field Artillery, 30th Division.
During the engagement, after having been struck by a shell splinter, Lieutenant Douglass continued his work of removing dead and wounded horses, and assisted in moving the carriages to a place of safety. He was again struck and killed. By his courage and devotion to duty he inspired the men of this section to continue their work successfully.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, E. T. Douglass.

First lieutenant, 320th Machine Gun Battalion, 82d Division. When his platoon had become greatly disorganized through many casualties, Lieutenant Douglass, although wounded, reorganized it and led it through hazardous machine-gun and artillery fire. He remained on duty for several days, during which time he suffered acutely from his wounds, until ordered to a dressing station.

Corporal, Company K, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
He, with 3 other soldiers, went out into an open field under heavy shell and machine-gun fire and succeeded in carrying back to our lines four seriously wounded men.

First lieutenant, pilot, 91st Aero Squadron, Air Service.
While on a photographic mission, he encountered a superior number of enemy pursuit planes. Notwithstanding the odds against him, he turned and dived on the hostile formation, destroying one plane and damaging another. He then continued on his mission and returned with photographs of great military

First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 371st Infantry, 93d Division.
Throughout 3 days of most intense action Lieutenant Dovell worked unceasingly in caring for the wounded, disregarding a severe wound which he himself received in the neek by a shell fragment. He remained continuously on duty, giving an example of fortitude and courage to all about him.

After his company had passed beyond the first line of the enemy's resistance and at a time when hostile machine-gun fire presented the most formidable resistance to the advance, Private Draper, single-handed, rushed a hostile machine-gun position, killed both of its defenders, and captured the gun.

Private, sanitary detachment, 120th Infantry, 30th Division. Throughout this period, Private Draughon labored unceasingly in evacuating the wounded from the front lines to the battalion aid post. On Oct. If you with complete disregard for his personal safety, he advanced under heavy shell and machine-gun fire beyond the front line, rendered first aid to a wounded officer, and assisted him to the rear.

Private, first class, Company G, 328th Infantry, 82d Division.
Acting as stretcher bearer, he displayed exceptional courage in transporting wounded from the battle field under machine-gun and artillery fire. He worked continuously for more than 48 hours without a rest supervising a detachment of stretcher bearers searching the woods for wounded.

Lieutenant colonel, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.

Leading the front-line battalion of his regiment throughout the entire attack,

Colonel Dravo was constantly under accurate machine-gun fire and incessant artillery fire. Having been ordered to advance, he personally formed his lines for attack, despite the fact that for 29 hours he had labored without rest or relief, and led his command forward, in the face of fiercest fire, encountering and subduing the enemy after a hand-to-hand struggle.

First sergeant, Company A, 141st Infantry, 36th Division.

He discovered a party of German troops going to the support of a machine-gun nest situated in a pocket near where the French and American lines joined. He called for volunteers and, with the aid of about 30 men, rushed the German positions, captured 4 machine guns, killed more than 40 of the enemy, captured 2, and returned to our lines without the loss of a man.

Private, Company F, 1st Gas Regiment. With 3 other soldiers, he advanced nearly 200 yards, over an open hillside exposed to machine-gun fire and carried 2 wounded men to the protection of a near-by trench.

Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 364th Infantry, 91st Division. Seriously wounded by shrapnel, he refused evacuation, but remained with his gun team for 3 days, rendering great assistance through a terrific encounter. His sufferings finally necessitated his removal to the hospital.

Sergeant, Company F, 130th Infantry, 33d Division.

During an attack on the town, Sergeant Drennon, although severely wounded, continued to lead his men until they had reached their objective, when he fell completely exhausted.

Sergeant, Company H, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.

Taking command of the platoon and also the advance patrol, when both their leaders had become casualties, and despite the fact that he was so severely gassed that he could hardly speak, Sergeant Dresbach pushed vigorously forward, compelling the enemy to run in confusion and causing them to surrender to a near-by division.

Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
After his company had captured two enemy fieldpieces and a large quantity of ammunition, enemy artillery attempted to blow up the ammunition with incendiary shells. At great risk to his life from the explosion of shells and grenades he extinguished the fires, thereby insuring the safety of his comrades and the retention by his company of its advanced position.

Private, Company I, 125th Infantry, 32d Division. Under heavy machine-gun fire, he went out in front of the position of his unit and administered first aid to three wounded men, being himself wounded while engaged in this courageous service.

Major, 306th Field Artillery, 77th Division.

While in command of the 2d Battalion, 306th Field Artillery, he voluntarily took one of the guns of his battalion forward to a position in advance of the immediate front line of the 308th Infantry. Although subjected to heavy machine-gun fire at short range and artillery fire he continued to direct the fire of his gun, and by his example of coolness and bravery encouraged his gun detachment to remain at their gun, thereby assisting greatly in repulsing a servere counterattack of the enemy.

Private, first class, Company L, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
During the attack made by his company, Private Ducy constantly carried messages under heaviest shellfire, insuring and maintaining liaison with all neighboring units.

Private, Company B, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.

In the face of terrific enemy machine-gun fire he voluntarily joined a squad of men from his company, openly exposed himself to the enemy, charged a machine-gun crew, and with his bayonet killed the gunner and all other members of the crew. His outstanding courage and devotion to duty inspired his comrades, raising their morale to a high pitch.

Private, Company E, 132d Infantry, 33d Division. During an enemy counterattack, accompanied by heavy fire, Private Duff volunteered and carried an important message to the battalion commander. He later led the sunporting company to its position in the line, displaying notable courage in facing machine-gun fire.

Private, medical detachment, 310th Infantry, 78th Division.

On Sept. 21, at Thiaucourt, France, he remained in the frontline trenches under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire, caring for the wounded and displaying utter disregard for personal danger while administering first-aid treatment to 40 men. During the advance of his company from St. Juvin to Grand Pre he followed immedately behind the first wave, under heavy machine gun and shellfire, caring for the wounded as they fell.

First lieutenant, chaplain, 165th Infantry, 42d Division. He devoted hinself tirelessly and unceasingly to the care of the wounded and dying in the village of Villers-sur-Fere, France, from July 28 to 31, 1918, Despite a constant and severe bombardment with shells and aerial bombs, he continued to circulate in and about the two aid stations and the hospitals, creating an atmosphere of cheerfulness and confidence by his courageous and inspiring example.

Private, first class, Company F, 306th Infantry, 77th Division.
Voluntarily joining a daylight patrol seeking information as to the strength and positions of the enemy, which was attacked about 100 yards beyond its own lines by an enemy hostile post of seven men. A moment later another enemy post was attacked and in hand-to-hand fighting, Private Duffy killed one of the enemy and was himself badly wounded. Although unable to walk and under heavy fire from near-by enemy posts, Private Duffy dragged himself to his own lines and gave valuable information as to the disposition of the enemy forces.

Second lieutenant, 53d Infantry, 6th Division.
During an attack by a German raiding party of about 300 men he took command of a post where the 5 men manning it had been killed or wounded by liquid fire. By his coolness and fearless exposure of himself he was able to hold the post with a small reinforcement. After the raid he removed some 20 grenndes which had become dangerously hot, due to the fire, and were about the carded. to explode.

First licutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 124th Field Artillery, 33d Division He displayed exceptional bravery in caring for the wounded and directing their evacuation under heavy shellfire. During the action he went under concentrated fire and rescued several wounded men.

Private, Company K, 325th Infantry, 82d Division.
Private Duffy, with another soldier, voluntarily made several trips out into No Man's Land, under heavy fire, and carried eight wounded men to cover.

Private, first class, Company G, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.

While a member of a raiding party which penetrated to the enemy's recond line, Private Duffy located a machine gun which was about to fire on the rear of his platoon. Exposing himself to heavy machine-gun fire he crawled to a position of vantage and shot the gunner and captured the gun and two other members of the crew.

First lieutenant, 317th Infantry, 80th Division.
Lieutenant Dugan, after several attempts to gain a foothold in the Bois-des-Ogons had failed, courageously led a platoon across a ravine covered by enemy fire and gained a foothold in the woods. This attack was made in the face of heavy machine-gun fire from the front and flank. The personal leadership and courage displayed by Lieutenant Dugan were vital factors in the success of the attack.

Postliumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Daniel A. Dugan.

Private, Company A, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.

When his section leader was killed, he took command of the section and led it against a machine-gun nest, capturing three machine guns and prisoners. He was dangerously wounded in this encounter, but continued to lead his men forward until he fell exhausted from loss of blood.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Bridget Dugan.

Private, Company B, 353d Infantry, 89th Division. Although hadly wounded in the face, he refused medical attention and assisted in an attack on a machine-gun nest, capturing one gun by himself.

Private, Company II, 167th Infantry, 42d Division. He displayed praiseworthy devotion to duty and courageous self-sacrifice when he remained at his post under heavy fire, receiving wounds that later caused his death.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. E. L. Duke.

Private, first class, medical detachment, 357th Infantry, 90th Division. Having been assigned to a company as first-aid man, he rendered most valiant service, working constantly under terrific fire. Never considering his own safety, he was always ready to administer to the wounded, his continued exposure resulting in wounds so severe that his death followed a few hours after he had received them.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, T. II. Dulaney.

Private, Company K, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
When it became vitally important to get a message to the battalion commander Private Dulevitz volunteered for the mission, knowing that it was necessary to pass through a terrific enemy barrage. Shortly after starting on his mission and while passing through the murderous fire he was instantly killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Ida Dulevitz.

Sergeant, Company D, 55th Infantry, 7th Division.

When one of his men became entangled in the barbed wire, Sergeant Duly alone went to his rescue under heavy fire. He then went forward alone, through intense artillery and machine-gun fire, to attack a machine-gun nest. While returning to our lines he fell exhausted from fatigue and shell shock.

Corporal, Company H, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.
When under heavy machine-gun fire, Corporal Dumais charged the machine gun from the flank, killed the gunner, dispersed the crew, and put the gun out of action.

Corporal, Company F, 4th Engineers, 4th Division. He was a member of a small detachment of Engineers which went out in advance of the front line of the Infantry through an enemy barrage from 77-millimeter and 1-pounder guns to construct a footbridge over the River Vesle. As soon as their operations were discovered machine-gun fire was opened up on them, but, undaunted, the party continued at work, removing the German wire entanglements and successfully completing a bridge which was of great value in subsequent corrections. in subsequent operations.

Captain, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Although wounded in the head and in a position exposed to intense machinegun and artillery fire, he refused to be evacuated until he had personally given nstructions to the second in command for carrying on the advance.

Sergeant, Company D, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
He led a daylight patrol against an enemy machine-gun emplacement which was harassing the advance of his company. Under the murderous fire from this gun his patrol was wiped out, but he pressed on alone, capturing the machine gun and gunner. He showed coolness and bravery under heavy fire, and his action materially facilitated the advance of his company.

Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 117th Infantry, 30th Division. Private Duncan, a runner, repeatedly carried messages with great coolness and daring, undeterred by the most intense artillery and machine-gun fire.

First sergeant, Company A, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.

During the operations against the Hindenburg line he displayed great gallantry and courage by going forward under heavy shell and machine-grant fire and bandaging the wounded and bringing them back to our lines. Throughout the engagement he exhibited a fearless disregard of the enemy's fire and performed valuable service by organizing new squads when his company suffering heavy casualties as a result of shell and machine-gun fire.

Private, Company A, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
During the engagement he set an example to the other members of his company by his gallant conduct. After the company was ordered to withdraw he voluntarily returned to the position his company had held, and throughout the night assisted in evacuating the wounded.

Private, first class, Company K, 139th Infantry, 35th Division.
Upon seeing his brother killed by a bursting shell as he was leading his platoon forward, Private Duncan displayed the utmost bravery and initiative in rushing forward, taking command of the platoon, which had been depleted by casualties and was in danger of becoming disorganized, and leading it forward in the advance.

Corporal, Company D, 354th Infantry, 89th Division. In command of the leading group of his platoon, he encountered a machine-gun nest, containing 6 guns, about 100 feet ahead of him. After opening fire on the enemy position, the automatic gunner and carrier of his group were shot. Corporal Duncan then took the automatic rifle and running forward into the approximation of the commandation of the commanda enemy fire shot and took prisoner the German machine-gun crews.

Major, chaplain, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.
While performing his duties as chaplain of the 126th Infantry, 32d Division, he repeatedly displayed exceptional qualities of personal courage and heroism in attendance upon the wounded, and dying, going from the most advanced points of the firing line to the several dressing stations, crossing and recrossing the lowlands of the Oureq River which were under intense artillery and machine-gun fire; again crossing and recrossing them when the entire valley was deaphed with one and against the protests of offliers who warmed him machine-gun fire; again crossing and recrossing them when the entire valley was drenched with gas, and against the protests of officers who warned him that he was doing so at the imminent risk of his own life. After having been severely gassed while in the performance of these errands of mercy, and tagged for evacuation, he refused to be evacuated and still persisted in carrying his errands of mercy to the wounded and dying, thereby enhancing the morale of the troops in his fearless disregard of personal danger and contributed materially to the success of the capture of the heights beyond the Ourcq River and the advance to the Vesle River at Fismes.

Corporal, Company L, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.
Knowing that two men were killed in attempting to rescue a wounded comrade who was lying far in front of the line, Corporal Dunlap volunteered and attempted the rescue. Despite the severe fire directed at this point, he successfully accomplished his mission.

Private, 96th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He showed conspicuous courage in capturing a machine gun unassisted during the street fighting in Bouresches, France, on the night of June 6, 1918. He was killed in the repulse of the enemy on the night of June 7-8, 1918. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Hattie Hall.

Private, first class, 140th Ambulance Company, 110th Sanitary Train, 35th Division.

Working as a litter bearer in the advanced area, when our front line dropped back, he remained on the field alone during the night, dressed the wounds of a number of soldiers, and earried them to the protection of a shell hole, later carrying them back to the dressing station. He continually exposed himself to machine-gun and artillery fire during this work.

Sergeant, Company M, 110th Infantry, 28th Division. Sergeant, Company M, 1000 (mainly, 2010 Division).

Early in the attack Sergeant Dunn was wounded in the leg by a bullet and ordered to the first-aid station, but he refused to leave and continued on in the advance. First lieutenant, chaplain, 306th Infantry, 77th Division.
While a crossroads was being heavily shelled by enemy artillery and after several men had been killed and others wounded, Chaplain Dunne, utterly disregarding his own safety, went to their assistance and ministered to them. He constantly exposed himself to the heaviest fire in order to assist the wounded men of his regiment, at all times displaying heroic conduct and superb devotion to his duty. His splendid and consistent bravery and contempt for his own safety was a continuing inspiration to every man in his regiment and served to build up a fine sense of duty and soldierly obligation in the organization.

Second lieutenant, 10th Field Artillery, 3d Division.

Wounded and gassed while directing the fire of 1 platoon of his company under terrific bombardment, he refused to be relieved. Although the area surrounding his position was heavily saturated with gas, he removed his gas mask in order that he could make his commands heard above the roar of the guns.

When his battalion commander was wounded during the crossing of the Vesle River he assumed command, rallied the scattered men, and reorganized them into fighting units, inspiring them by his own brave and determined spirit. His judgment in selecting strong points and making his dispositions made possible the success of the operations. In the course of the action he encountered a hostile machine-gun nest, killing the officer in command of it with a rifle and capturing 14 prisoners. He then turned the captured gun on the enemy and expended 4,000 rounds of captured ammunition in covering an exposed flank an exposed flank.

Corporal, Battery A, 10th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
Corporal Duty volunteered and succeeded in carrying messages between the front line and advance P. C., when other runners failed to get through under severe fire of artillery and machine guns.

First lieutenant, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.

Commanding a platoon of 37-millimeter guns, Lieutenant Dwiggins carried 2 guns to the top of a hill under intense machine-gun fire and opened effective fire at short range on the enemy machine-gun nests. Heavy shellfire was directed at his guns and one of them was put out of action. Sending his men to cover, he remained with the second gun in the face of heavy machine-gun and artillery fire. Even after being wounded in the leg by a machine-gun bullet he continued to fire his gun until it exploded, displaying remarkable disregard for personal safety.

Corporal, Company D, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.

After an advance through heavy machine-gun fire, from which his organization had suffered many casualties and he himself had been twice wounded, Corporal Dye had taken refuge in a shell hole, when he heard the cries of a wounded comrade who was lying in an exposed position. Disregarding the intense machine-gun fire, he crossed an open space, dressed the wounds of his comrade, and carried him to shelter.

First lieutenant, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.

On Oct. 9, when his company was held up by heavy fire from numerous machine guns, Lieutenant Dyer showed extraordinary bravery in driving them out and allowing the advance of the battalion to continue. On Oct. 17, when all the officers of an adjoining company had been killed, he promptly took command under the terrific enemy fire, and although twice wounded continued to lead the two companies in the advance.

Captain, 60th Infantry, 5th Division. Prompted by his great devotion to duty, he preferred to remain on duty with a detachment of his companions organized as a carrying party, desiring to see that his detail performed the work assigned to them to the very utmost. While passing through a swamp where most of the platoon was wounded,
Corporal Earl dressed the wounds of several of his comrades and, after reaching the shelter of a hill beyond, returned repeatedly and assisted many of his comrades to a place of safety.

Corporal, Company E, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
When his company had been held up by a machine-gun nest, he advanced on the nest from the flank and captured it single handed.

Sergeant, Company A, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

He volunteered and guided 3 wounded men to a first-aid station through machine-gun fire. He was wounded while on this mission, but, learning that his company was to make an advance, refused to be evacuated and returned to duty, bringing important information as to the enemy positions.

First lieutenant, Infantry, observer, 1st Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Because of intense aerial activity on the opening day of the St. Mihiel offensive, Lieutenant Easterbrook, observer, and Second Lieutenant Ralph E. de Castro, pilot, volunteered to fly over the enemy's lines on a photographic mission without the usual protection of accompanying battle planes. Notwithstanding the low-hanging clouds, which necessitated operation at an altitude of only 400 meters, they penetrated 4 kilometers beyond the German lines. Attacked by four enemy machines, they fought off their foes, completed their photographic mission, and returned safely.

Corporal, Company B, 3d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division.
When the advance of the Infantry line was held up by enemy machine-gun fire, Corporal Echols led his machine-gun crew in advance of the Infantry line and, although exposed to heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, he acted as gunner and opened an effective fire which silenced 2 enemy machine guns and allowed the Infantry to advance. Later he again led his crew forward and while engaging an enemy machine-gun nest was severely wounded.

Second lieutenant, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
When heavy fire was encountered from enemy machine-gun nests located in a railroad cut, Lieutenant Eckel led his platoon in several successful attacks on these nests, personally killing and wounding a number of the enemy with his pistol and disarming 1 of them in a hand-to-hand struggle. He then nis pistor and disarming 1 of them in a hand-to-hand struggle. He then reorganized the captured position and held out against the enemy with such men as he had left, opening fire himself with an automatic rifle, which he secured from a dead soldier. While attempting to destroy some enemy machine-gun nests in front of his platoon this gallant officer was mortally wounded by a shell fragment.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Hugh Eckel.

First lieutenant, 115th Infantry, 29th Division. While leading his platoon in the Bois-de-Consenvoye in an attack against strong enemy machine-gun nests he was severely wounded. He continued to advance, routed the enemy from their positions, and refused to leave his platoon until it was reorganized.

Private, Company C, 3d Ammunition Train, 3d Division.
On the morning of the 15th of July Private Eckweiler, with Private McNames, volunteered and brought up a truck for the purpose of saving the records of the 30th Infantry, which were in danger of capture. He was killed while attempting this mission.

Second lieutenant, 39th Infantry, 4th Division.

While in command of a platoon of his regiment it was severely bombed by enemy planes and under intense artillery fire. Serious disorganization followed the bombing. Taking steps for the safety of his unit he went forward under heavy artillery fire and assisted in the reorganization of units and, though badly wounded, insisted upon the evacuation of all other wounded before accepting first aid for himself. His splendid example of courage and devotion inspired every man of his command.

First lieutenant, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

An order having been received from division headquarters for an accurate report on the strength present in the front line, Lieutenant Edmunds crawled from shell hole to shell hole in broad daylight and in plain view of the enemy, who kept him under continuous sniping fire from numerous machine guns. Going on under these conditions, he personally counted every man in the front line of the battalion that he was commanding, and made his report to the regimental commander.

Private, Company M, 126th Infantry, 32d Division. In an attack on Cote Dame Marie the 126th Infantry was held up owing to intense enemy machine-gun fire and grenades. Private Edsall volunteered as a member of a combat patrol which cut through the enemy lines, captured 10 machine guns, killed and captured 15 of the enemy, and forced a large number to surrender, clearing the Cote Dame Marie of the enemy, thus enabling the regiment to continue their advance.

Private, Company C, 3d Machine Gun Battalion, 1st Division.

Serving as gunner of his machine-gun squad he advanced with the first assault line of the Infantry and while passing through the village of Cantigny at 5.30 a. m., May 28, carrying his machine gun upon his shoulder, he was attacked by an enemy soldier and bayoneted, receiving a severe wrist wound; the enemy soldier was killed by an infantryman. Continuing in the advance beyond Cantigny and meeting intense enemy fire, the attacking wave was halted. Private Edwards with his squad remained in an advanced position, protecting with his fire the Infantry which had fallen back to a more advantageous position and were intrenching. While thus engaged the machine gunners repulsed two determined enemy counterattacks, during which the three members of the squad accompanying Private Edwards were killed and he himself severely wounded. Despite these wounds, which he himself dressed, he remained alone in his position throughout the day, firing whenever a target offered, withstanding attacks by liquid fire and machine-gun fire; he refused to be evacuated and continued to operate his gun until nightfall, when his company was relieved. His extraordinary bravery and defall, when his company was relieved. His extraordinary bravery and devotion to duty, his fortitude and undaunted determination despite his numerous and painful wounds, incited the men of his battalion to splendid endeavors and raised their morale to an extremely high pitch.

Sergeant, Company F, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

On July 3 an American column being fired upon when debouching from a mountain pass, Colonel Eichelberger voluntarily assisted in establishing the firing line, prevented confusion, and, by his total disregard for his own safety, raised the morale of the American forces to a high pitch.

First lieutenant, Cavalry, aid-de-camp, 2d Infantry Brigade, 1st Division. Lieutenant Eichelsdoerfer with another officer made a most hazardous reconnaissance of the enemy position along the River Meuse and supplied valuable information of these positions. During the entire exploit they were constantly under enemy observations and heavy fire of their guns.

Sergeant, sanitary detachment, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
While the regimental dressing station was under heavy shell fire he volunteered to lead a squad of litter bearers to rescue several wounded men of another regiment who had been caught in a heavy barrage. He succeeded in leading lis squad for a distance of 3 kilometers through a constant severe bombard-ment under direct observation of the enemy artillery and snipers to an outpost outside of his own regimental sector. He brought in 1 wounded officer and 7 severely wounded soldiers without losing any of his own men.

Sergeant, Company H, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.

Advancing ahead of his platoon, Sergeant Eigenauer engaged 2 enemy machine-gun nests, killing all the gunners. He then led his platoon forward until the fire of the enemy became so dense that he was obliged to dig in.

Sergeant, first class, photographic section, Signal Corps, attached to 26th Division.

He fearlessly advanced to a forward position during the attack of the 104th Infantry, in order to secure pictures of the attacking troops. After being severely wounded he continued his work until ordered to the rear. His gallant conduct stimulated the morale of the advancing troops.

First lieutenant, 58th Infantry, 4th Division. The courageous conduct of Lieutenant Eklund while in command of the left flank platoon of the division during a strong enemy counterattack, exposed to heavy machine-gun and rifle fire, had a great moral effect on his men. The attack was repulsed after a hand-to-hand encounter in which many casualties were suffered.

Private, Company K, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
Private Elia, on his own initiative, advanced to an exposed position of great danger, and with his automatic rifle killed 18 Germans. Due to the individual efforts of this soldier his company was able to advance. He continued his fire until he was killed.

Ellis rushed forward alone, in the face of direct machine-gun fire, to an enemy machine-gun nest 50 yards in advance of his platoon, and by the effective use of his pistol killed 5 of the enemy and captured 26 prisoners, together with the machine gun. Although he had been scriously wounded in two places while advancing he held the position until his platoon came up.

Captain, 306th Infantry, 77th Division.

He displayed great courage by leading a mounted reconnaissance patrol a kilometer in advance of our lines, developed the enemy's line by drawing fire from his machine guns, and remained under this heavy machine-gun fire until the emplacements had been located.

Private, Machine Gun Company, 103d Infantry, 25th Division.
The left company of the battalion engaged in attack against Hill 190 between Bouresches and Belleau was checked by intense enemy fire, the right company proceeding toward its objective, thus creating a dangerous break in the line. The battalion commander found it imperative to establish communication with the commander of the right company. Private Ellsworth volunteered to carry the message, crossing an open field in full view of the enemy machine gunners for a distance of 200 yards. Returning to the battalion post of command he was wounded in the hand and shot through the chest, the bullet resering through the heaty. Not withstanding his savera wounds, he relet passing through the body. Notwithstanding his severe wounds he reported back after accomplishing his mission and then walked to a dressing station, from which he was evacuated. The heroic act of Private Ellsworth proved an inspiration to the men of his battalion.

Second lieutenant, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.

When he was asked to send out a squad in advance of the line under heavy machine-gun fire to enfilade enemy artillery, Lieutenant Elmer asked for and received permission to lead the party, and by his bravery and coolness succeeded in driving the enemy gunners away from their guns.

Corporal, Company K, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
Early in the attack on Hill 212, Corporal Emerson was severely wounded but continued to lead his squad in advance until ordered to the rear. Having successfully reached the objective, he administered first aid to a number of his wounded comrades, fearlessly exposing himself to further danger in the performance of this voluntary work.

First lieutenant, 311th Infantry, 78th Division.
Lieutenant Emerson displayed remarkable gallantry and leadership during the fighting north of Grand Pre when the line of his regiment was the pivot for the advance of the Army. He personally led his company around machinegun nests, frequently going out with selected patrols for the purpose of bombing out enemy machine gunners. When the commanding officer of the company on his left was incapacitated he at once took command of the company and maneuvered it with his own. By his example, in undergoing hardships during the advance, he sustained the morale of his men and inspired them to valiant combat. spired them to valiant combat.

Private, first class, sanitary detachment, 107th Infantry, 27th Division. Displaying an absolute disregard of danger in earing for wounded under shell and rifle fire and a continuous cheerfulness under trying conditions, his courageous example was inspiring to his comrades.

Major, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.
Major Emery, with the greatest gallantry and utter disregard for his own safety, personally led the advance of his battalion against the strongly occupied position of the enemy, holding it to the attack by force of leadership, in an extremely thick fog and under heavy enemy artillery and machinegun fire. When the fog lifted, his battalion was so close upon the enemy that the latter, though equipped with many machine guns, retired from their position. While deliberately proceeding to a vantage point which was under very heavy enemy fire, in order that he might better direct the combat, he fell severely wounded by shell fire.

First lieutenant, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
While attached to the regimental post of command in the rear, Lieutenant Emery voluntarily joined the assaulting battalion as a platoon leader in a company which was short of officers. When desperate hostile resistance was encountered at the outset of the attack and all the other officers of the company became casualties, he took command of the company and courageously led his men in overcoming enemy machine-gun nests. While rushing an enemy position at the head of his men this gallant officer was killed.

Private, Company D, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.

Private Endler, while preceding his platoon in an advance, met 2 German machine-gun groups, and by his rifle fire and accurate information sent back to his platoon made it possible for that flank of his company to advance During the engagement he saved many lives by carrying valuable information to his company commander through heavy machine-gun fire.

Sergeant, Company F, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
Sergeant Engel repeatedly advanced under fire in front of our lines, locating enemy positions. He displayed the utmost bravery and fearlessness on all occasions, as well as cool judgment. On Oct. 10 he was leading a patrol under heavy enemy fire and was wounded by an enemy machine-gun bullet. Although badly wounded he refused to go to the rear for aid, but continued the advance until he had obtained the desired information.

He flew as low as 50 feet from the ground behind the enemy's lines, harassing German troops with machine-gun fire and subjecting himself to attack from ground batteries, machine guns, and rifles. He twice drove off enemy planes which were attempting to destroy an American observation balloon. On Sept. 12 and 13, 1918, he flew at extremely low altitudes and carried out Infantry contact patrols successfully. Again, on Sept. 12, he attacked a German battery, forced the crew to abandon it, on Scpt. 12, he attacked a German battery, forced the crew to abandon it, shot off of his horse a German officer who was trying to escape, drove the cannoneers to their dugouts, and kept them there until the Infantry could come up and capture them.

For the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near Sedan, France, Nov. 5, 1918, Lieutenant Erwin was awarded an oak-leaf cluster to be worn with his distinguished-service cross: Against the advice of experienced officers, he undertook a reconnaissance flight in the face of atmospheric conditions that rendered flying most dangerous. In order that his observer night tions that rendered flying most dangerous. In order that his observer night gain the necessary information, he was forced to fly at a perilously low altitude and was subject to continuous antiaircraft and rifle fire. When information gained on the flight had been dropped at division headquarters, he circled and returned over the enemy lines, although on the first reconnaissance mission his plane had been repeatedly hit by bullets. Penetrating far into enemy territory, he maneuvered most skillfully and, with shells bursting near him, flew low while his observer poured deadly fire upon machine-gun nests that had been holding up the advance of our troops. When his machine was crippled by enemy fire he displayed exceptional skill in effecting a landing upon rocky land within the enemy lines. With his observer, he beat off repeated enemy attacks and fought his way back to the American lines with information of vital importance to our troops.

First lieutenant, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.

Never faltering in his advance during the attack on the hill commanding Marcuilen-Dole, and disregarding all personal danger, he led his company forward through heavy fire until he was killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. William H. Eyler.

Private, Battery A, 120th Field Artillery, 32d Division.
When the men of his battery position had been ordered to shelter on account of enemy shelling, he, in company with two other men, rescued a French soldier from drowning in a stream. The act was performed while the valley was filled with mustard gas.

Sergeant, 76th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He attacked and captured a machine gun that was inflicting losses on the American lines. In addition, he volunteered and successfully delivered messages of great importance to his battalion commander through a machinegun and artillery barrage.

Oak-leaf cluster. Sergeant Faga was also awarded an oak-leaf cluster, to be worn with the distriguished service cross, for the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near Ardennes, France, Nov. 1, 1918: Just as he was to be evacuated to the rear because of severe wounds he saw that his platoon was without a commander, both leaders having become casualties. Returning to the lines, he assumed command for the remainder of the attack, successfully accomplishing the priories. plishing his mission.

Sergeant, Company B, 311th Infantry, 78th Division. He made three attempts to silence several machine guns which had beld up his platoon. He retired only after he had been wounded and his companions killed or wounded.

First lieutenant, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
Lieutenant Fair, with a noncommissioned officer, while in advance of our line, encountered an enemy patrol engaged in removing wounded Americans. They attacked and succeeded in putting the enemy to flight. The noncommissioned officer was sent back for reinforcements, but Lieutenant Fair continued on and captured an enemy officer. Later, with the assistance of others, he removed to safety all the wounded.

Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 112th Infantry, 28th Division. Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 112th Infantry, 28th Division.

While in command of a section of machine guns, Sergeant Fairall made a reconnaissance in advance of his gun position. Encountering a party of the enemy, he kept them engaged until he was wounded in the left arm. He refused immediate evacuation and later guided a company of Infantry to a position in the front line in time to avoid a serious situation. He continued to act as runner for his organization until forced to be evacuated on account of his wounds. wounds.

Private, medical detachment, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
During the advance in the vicinity of Vaux-Andigny Private James K. Faison for four days and four nights worked unceasingly dressing the wounded and giving them water. On five different occasions he went out over ground swept by enemy shell and machine-gun fire to rescue the wounded, at times within 100 yards and in direct view of the enemy positions.

Private, medical detachment, 311th Infantry, 78th Division. He remained on duty continuously for four hours, administering aid to wounded men under heavy shellfire. Finding that he could not properly work while wearing his gas mask, he removed it, although many gas shells were bursting in his vicinity. After being gassed he continued to work for an hour until all the wounded were attended, FALLAW, THOMAS H. A.A., 110MAS H. Near Landres-et-St. Georges, France, Oct. 16, 1918. R.—Opelika, Ala. Captain, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.

In the attack on the Cote-de-Chatillon, seeing that the entire advance was being held up in an open field by heavy machine-gun fire from the edge of the woods, he personally organized a detachment and led it in a rush on the woods under heavy fire, making a daring and vigorous attack on the enemy machine-gun the selection of the weeds contraints relicative and idition. gun nests, clearing the edge of the woods, capturing prisoners, and inflicting severe losses on the enemy. Through this gallant act he gained the final objective with a minimum loss to his command and set an inspiring example of disregard for personal safety and devotion to duty.

Sergeant, sanitary detachment, 115th Infantry, 29th Division.

First lieutenant, 35th Infantry, 18th Division. In an engagement with hostile Mexicans at Nogales, Ariz., Aug. 27, 1918, while commanding the gnard, 35th U. S. Infantry.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 353d Infantry, 89th Division. He displayed exceptional bravery in three times carrying messages through severe artillery barrages.

Sergeant, Company E, 23d Infantry, 2d Division. As Sergeant Farkas was leading his platoon in an attack on a machine-gun nest, a bullet struck him in the eye, destroying its sight. Despite this agonizing wound he continued in advance and put the enemy machine-gun nest out of action, refusing to seek medical aid until the success of his platoon's mission had been assured, more than an hour and a half later

Corporal, Company L, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
During the attack near Soissons, on Aug. 30, Corporal Farmer led his squad through a downpour of shell and machine-gun fire. After the attack he worked in the face of machine-gun fire, assisting and carrying the wounded from the field. On October 8, while on a reconnoitering party, three of his men were killed and two wounded. He carried the two wounded men back to safety in the face of intense machine-gun fire.

Secretary Y. M. C. A., attached to 3d Battalion, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

Secretary Farmer voluntarily established an advanced dressing station under enemy machine-gun and artillery fire. He continued to render first aid until forced back by a threatened counterattack, at which time he personally assisted two scriously wounded men to the first-aid station, then returning to the line and remaining with the unit until it was relieved.

First lieutenant, pilot, 96th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

After being badly wounded Lieutenant Farnsworth shot down an enemy plane and made a perfect landing. His first thoughts upon landing were for his observer, who had been thrown from his plane during the action. Lieutenant Farnsworth died shortly after being taken to the aid station.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John Farnsworth.

Sergeant 96th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He led his section with remarkable coolness and courage in the advance under heavy fire of machine guns and artillery. He was severely wounded but continued to advance, thereby setting such an inspiring example to the men of his section that they routed the enemy.

Private, Company A, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

On the night of Feb. 28, 1918, while under heavy barrage fire on the Monte des

Second lieutenant, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
On the night of July 14-15, 1918, he continually exposed himself to heavy gas and shell fire while caring for the wounded until he was overcome by gas and exhaustion.

First lieutenant, 109th Infantry, 28th Division.
Although painfully wounded at the start of an attack, he refused to be evacuated, but continued to lead his platoon forward until ordered to withdraw.
His courage was an inspiration to his command.

First lieutenant, 309th Infantry, 78th Division.

In the attack on the Bois-de-Loges, when his company commander was severely wounded, Lieutenant Field took command of the company and, although he himself was severely wounded, continued to lead his men with great ceolness and aggressiveness, being the only officer with the company. In the face of extremely heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, he conducted the advance so skillfully as to capture over 60 prisoners and 5 machine guns. Although his wound had so disabled him that he had great difficulty in adjusting his gas mask, in spite of continued periods of gas shelling, he refused to be evacuated until the following morning, when his battalion was relieved by another organization. by another organization.

Corporal, Company D, 130th Infantry, 33d Division.

With utter disregard of his personal danger, he went in to an intense enemy barrage to rescue a wounded soldier. While accomplishing this heroic feat he was seriously wounded.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Ida Fields.

Sergeant, Company C, 14th Machine Gun Battalion, 5th Division.
Sergeant Fields placed his machine gun on a forward and exposed slope and opened an effective fire on the enemy position. The enemy concentrated ergeant rierds placed his machine gun on a forward and exposed slope and opened an effective fire on the enemy position. The enemy concentrated machine-gun fire on his position, but by his fearless conduct he continued to fire, and succeeded in silencing 3 enemy machine guns, thus enabling the lnfantry to advance. At Clery-le-Grande, Nov. 1, 1918, after being severely wounded, Sergeant Fields refused medical attention, directing the medical personnel to other wounded.

Corporal, Company K, 364th Infantry, 91st Division.
Responding to a call for volunteers, Corporal Figgins, with 5 others, advanced 400 yards beyond their front to bring in wounded comrades. They succeeded in rescuing 7 of their men, also in bringing in the dead body of a lieutenant while exposed to terrific machine-gun fire.

Private, Company D, 311th Infantry, 78th Division.

On the night of Sept. 23-24, Private Fligen repeatedly carried messages between his company and battalion headquarters through a heavy barrage, until completely exhausted. On the morning of Sept. 26, he volunteered and carried an important message to battalion headquarters through a heavy machine are few through a property for the control of chine-gun fire.

Private, Company H, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.

In the action of Mar. 5, 1918, near Pexonne, France, he displayed courageous devotion to duty by remaining at his post under heavy fire and after being wounded. Died from wounds received Mar. 6, 1918.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, G. L. Fillingin.

Private, medical detachment, 4th Infantry, 3d Division. Having been wounded and ordered to the rear, Private Fillyaw nevertheless continued to administer first-aid treatment to other wounded men under constant shell fire until he was wounded a second time, when he was evacuated, despite his protests.

First lieutenant, adjutant, 3d Battalion, 372d Infantry, 93d Division. He voluntarily led a portion of the first attacking wave over the enemy's position in the face of intense artillery and machine-gun fire. Later he, in company with another officer, voluntarily advanced under heavy fire to the enemy's wire and cut an opening for the passage of our troops.

Private, Battery A, 124th Field Artillery, 33d Division.
Private Fink, a driver, was seriously wounded by shell fire while going forward to the front-line Infantry trenches with bis platoon, but he remained at his post, refusing to seek medical attention until he fell from his horse exhausted.

Private, Company K, 165th Infantry, 42d Division. He saw six Germans about to make a prisoner of his corporal, who had been severely wounded in the ankle. He called a comrade and advanced on the Germans, killed two of them, took the other four prisoners, and returned with his corporal to our lines.

In the fighting near Gesnes, Corporal Finley's platon became isolated in a position far in advance of the rest of his company. In order to obtain liaison Corporal Finley twice voluntarily carried messages from his platoon to the remainder of the company. In order to do this it was necessary to cross two stretches which were entirely open to the enemy's fire. In spite of this, Corporal Finley carried out his mission successfully and completed plans for the withdrawal of the platoon that night. During the withdrawal of the platoon Corporal Finley repeatedly returned to search for wounded men whom he carried on his back to a place of safety.

Private, medical detachment, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.

Despite the severe bombardment of machine guns, he went into an open field to administer to wounded officers and men. He was killed while rendering aid to these men.

Captain, 49th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
While flying alone Captain Fisher encountered two enemy biplanes which were attempting to cross our lines. He attacked them and shot down one of them.
He then pursued the other, forcing it to go down out of control about 10 kilometers within the enemy lines.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 103d Infantry, 26th Division.
While a member of the party making a raid on Riaville, after the detachment had been ordered to retire upon completion of its mission, Corporal Fisher voluntarily went forward at great personal risk of his life through extremely heavy hostile machine-gun fire and succeeded in carrying back to his own lines a helpless wounded comrade. His act was one of great devotion to duty and was an inspiration to his comrades.

Second lieutenant, 14th Cavalry, U. S. Army. In a hand-to-hand fight in a trench in the jungle, Lieutenant Fisher killed three Moros and cleared the trench.

Captain, 6ist Infantry, 5th Division.

After all means of conveyance across the canal had been destroyed by enemy shell fire, Captain Fisher bravely called on his company to swim, he himself leading his men into the water. The successful accomplishment of this task made it possible for him to attack and capture the height on the east side of the river and drive out the enemy, who were holding the bridgehead.

Captain, 7th Infantry, 3d Division. He fearlessly led his troops in a counterattack through intense artillery fire, inspiring his men by his gallant conduct. He lost his life while in a performance of this act.

Second lieutenant, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
When a friendly tank appeared suddenly out of the fog and opened fire on his organization, Lieutenant Fitts rushed in front of the tank, signaling it to cease firing. He was wounded in the clest in the performance of this act, but remained with his organization until compelled to go to the rear due to weakness caused from loss of blood.

Private, Company L, 104th Infantry, 26th Division. He displayed coolness, courage, and the spirit of self-sacrifice in action of Apr. 10, 1918, digging out a buried comrade while under heavy fire, persisting in his work until he received a mortal wound, of which he died Apr. 11, 1918. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Edward Fitzgerald.

Sergeant, Company M, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Sergeant Fitzgerald repeatedly volunteered for patrol duty during the period of the Germans' occupation south of the Marac, and while a member of a reconnoitering patrol, his patrol was fired upon by machine guas from a German strong point. The patrol withdrew with the exception of Sergeant Fitzgerald, who remained in the vicinity under a heavy fire and courageously continued his reconnaissance until his mission had been accomplished, after which he killed two Germans and returned with valuable information.

Private, section No. 625, Ambulance Service

His ambulance broke down while he was on his way to an advance post along a road then under steady machine-gun fire. In spite of the enemy fire, he attempted to repair the machine, but was unable to do so. Securing assistance, he repaired it under fire in full view of the enemy and continued to make repeated trips with wounded through machine-gun and artillery bombardment.

Sergeant, Company L, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.

After his platoon commander had been killed, Sergeant Fitzpatrick took command of the platoon. Although painfully wounded in the arm early in the engagement, and constantly exposed to intense machine-gun and artillery fire and gas, he remained at his post directing and encouraging his men until his above the constant of the cons his platoon was relieved late that night, when he was evacuated.

With 3 other soldiers he crawled across an open field, subjected to heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, for 200 yards, to flank 3 enemy emplacements which were holding up the advance. This volunteer patrol captured the machine-gun positions, killing 7 and capturing 23 of the enemy.

Private, Battery A, 313th Field Artillery, 80th Division. The fieldpiece of which Private Flanagan was gunner was moved by hand to a position exposed to observation and enemy fire, in order to deliver direct fire upon the enemy guns near Vilosnes. The officer in charge was called away early in the engagement and Private Flanagan took command during the critical period and fired 200 rounds at enemy guns. In spite of the heavy enemy fire concentrated upon his position, he delivered a very effective fire on the enemy. He ceased to fire only after his gun had been struck by shell splinters from both front and rear.

Second licutenant, 28th Infantry, 1st Division. Lieutenant Flanagan personally led his platoon in an attack on several machinegun nests which were holding up the advance of the entire battalion. At times he was 50 yards in advance of his men. His action so inspired his com-mand that the enemy strong point was destroyed and 100 prisoners were captured. He was severely wounded in the attack.

Sergeant, Company D, 341st Machine Gun Battalion, 89th Division. During heavy enemy shell fire he kept excellent control over his gun section, and when severely wounded refused to be cared for until other men received first aid.

First lieutenant, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.

At great peril to his life on the night of June 3, 1918, he voluntarily swam the River Marne, near Sauvigny, France, and brought back a wounded French soldier, who, having escaped from his German captors, was unable to return to his own lines.

Second lieutenant, observer, 12th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
He and 2d Lieut. Dogan H. Arthur, pilot, executed a difficult mission of infantry contact patrol, without protection of accompanying battle planes, on the first day of the St. Mihiel offensive. After being driven back twice by a patrol of 9 enemy planes, they courageously made a third attempt in the face of a third attack by the same planes, found the American lines, and after being shot down, but falling uninjured in friendly territory, communicated their valuable information to headquarters. Oak-leaf cluster.

Oak-leaf cluster.

An oak-leaf cluster is awarded Lieutenant Fleeson for the following act: On Oct. 30, 1918, at Carbuzancy, France, he accompanied a formation of 9 planes on a photographic mission in German territory. Six planes turned back before reaching the enemy line, and the remaining 3 were attacked by 18 planes when they had penetrated 12 kilometers into enemy country. After his 2 companions, whom he tried to assist, were shot down, Licutenant Fleeson fought his way back to his own lines, destroying 2 enemy planes in the combat.

Captain, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.

Amid showers of machine-gun bullets and artillery shells of all calibers, at Berzy-le-Sec, France, July 21, 1918, he gallantly proceeded to the front lines for vital information needed by the division commander, and accomplished his mission in spite of the great danger to which he was exposed.

Private, Company L, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.

When his platoon had been ordered to cover because of annihilating machine gun and artillery fire, Private Flegel accompanied another soldier to the rescue of a comrade who was lying 300 yards distant. The journey was made through heavy and continuous fire, but Private Flegel, with his fellow soldier, succeeded in bringing their wounded comrade to safety.

Private, Company K, 115tb Infantry, 29th Division.

After a raid against enemy trenches, he volunteered to accompany bis platoon leader into no man's land to rescue a missing member of the platoon who had been wounded. While engaged in this courageous duty he was mortally wounded.

Major, 315th Infantry, 79th Division. On the night of Nov. 9, he received a serious and painful wound from a high-explosive shell, but refused to be evacuated, and continued in command of his battalion until the signing of the armistic on Nov. 11. He was exposed not only to heavy enemy fire but to severe weather conditions as well.

Corporal, Company G, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.
When the advance was held up by fire from an enemy machine gun, Corporal Fleming, with utter disregard of personal danger, rushed out alone in the face of terrific machine-gun and shell fire, attacked the machine-gun nest, killing the gunner, capturing the 4 remaining members of the crew and bringing them back to our lines.

Sergeant, first class, Company B, 112th Engineers, 37th Division.
Sergeant Flesher, with two other soldiers, crossed the Scheldt River after two attempts and succeeded in stretching a line for the bridge across the stream.
They were discovered and fired upon by the enemy, but they continued at work driving stakes and made a second trip across the river to obtain wire, despite the fact that a violent artillery barrage had been laid down on their positions.

Captain, 362d Infantry, 91st Division.

Although he was severely wounded, he continued to lead his company in the assault on Gesnes; then, much weakened by his wound, he reorganized his company and directed its employment as a covering detachment in the withdrawal. He remained with his company until ordered to leave his post and receive medical treatment. He showed throughout the engagement a devotion to duty only exceeded by his utter disregard of personal safety.

Corporal, 79th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

After being severely wounded in the capture of Bouresches, France, June 6, 1918, he refused to go to the rear for treatment, but remained at his post and urged on his men to renewed efforts.

First lieutenant, section No. 517, Ambulance Service.

He was on his way to establish an advance aid station during a heavy bombardment when he was wounded by a shell fragment and his right eardrum broken. Two men accompanying him were killed, and the concussion of the exploding shell knocked him into a ditch full of water, where he lay for an hour. Displaying unfaltering devotion to duty, he continued on his mission, established the aid station, and remained in command of his section.

First lieutenant, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.
When his battalion was attacked by a greatly superior force, Lieutenant Fletcher, intelligence officer, organized a detachment and successfully defended an important position. Later, when our barrage was falling short, he voluntarily carried a message to the Artillery for the purpose of correcting the fire.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, George Fletcher.

First sergeant, Company I, 138th Infantry, 35th Division.
When his company commander was killed and his company left without officers, Sergeant Fling took command of the company, successfully withdrew it from the midst of machine-gun nests, reorganized it, and continued the advance. He was severely wounded in the head the next day, but insisted on remaining on duty with his company and advancing in the attack, notwithstanding the fact that the advance was over a gassed area and his wounds prevented him wearing a gas mask.

Corporal, Machine Gun Company, 165th Infantry, 42d Division. Stationed with the company train near a French battery of artillery, Corporal Flint, then a mechanic, left a concrete shelter and volunteered to carry a severely wounded French soldier to the dressing station. To reach the dressing station, over a kilometer away, he crossed an open field, subjected at the time to intense artillery bombardment. Later when a 150-millimeter shell burst near a shelter tent in which he was sleeping, killing one and wounding three other noncommissioned officers and hurling Corporal Flint several yards, he called assistance and supervised the care of the wounded.

Private, 79th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. In the capture of Bouresches, France, June 6, 1918, he was twice hit in the leg, but he dragged his automatic rifle 200 yards forward, opened fire on an enemy machine gun, and silenced it.

After the capture of Hill 212, near Sergy, Lieutenant Follis personally directed the consolidation of the position. He continually exposed himself to sweeping machine-gun fire while looking after the care and evacuation of all wounded men on the field, personally making sure that all were taken to the aid station.

Private, first class, Company L, 361st Infantry, 91st Division.
His company, checked by a heavy barrage of machine gun and artillery fire, with gas shells interspersed, he volunteered to carry an important message from bis company commander to the commander of an artillery unit. With great gallantry he accomplished his mission in the face of intense enemy fire. He was killed in action on Oct. 10, 191s, fighting for Hill 255. His high courage and splendid soldierly qualities were important factors in the operations of his company, and inspired his comrades to great endeavors.

First lieutenant, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.

Although he was painfully wounded on Oct. 8, he remained on duty, taking command of his company 6 days later, when he was the only officer present, and effectively reorganizing the command after its strength had been greatly reduced. Still suffering from his wound, he led his company in attack on Oct. 17 and stayed at his post for 2 days thereafter until his battalion was relieved. relieved.

Major, 145th Infantry, 37th Division.

Although severely wounded and his jaw shattered by a machine-gun bullet, he refused to be evacuated, administered first aid himself, and continued to fearlessly direct his battalion during a strong counterattack. The personal example of this officer was a vital factor in the success of the operation.

Corporal, Company I, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
While his patrol was acting as a flank guard, with orders not to fire unless absolutely necessary, he detected an enemy patrol of 8 men approaching and starting to set up a machine gun. Crawling forward alone, he charged the enemy patrol and, single-handed, killed 3 Germans and routed the other 5.

Private, first class, Company D, 354th Infantry, 89th Division.

Private Forbis, a member of the leading combat group of his platoon, encountered a machine-gun nest of 6 guns. Although only 100 feet from the nest, he remained at his automatic rifle, pouring in such a sheath of bullets on the enemy that it enabled his comrades to outflank the nest. He remained at his post until seyerely wounded. His exceptional nerve and coolness were an inspiration to his comrades throughout the action.

Second lieutenant, 141st Infantry, 36th Division.

After all the officers of his company had been killed or wounded, Lieutenant Ford took command of the company and with about 24 men advanced beyond the main line, over extremely difficult ground, capturing 24 enemy machine guns. Lieutenant Ford established his men in a good position, practically isolated from the rest of the line, and, manning the captured guns, held the position under heavy machine-gun and shell fire for about 60 hours. Sergeant Forehand showed exceptional bravery and devotion to duty by advancing with another soldier, though separated from his platoon, in the attack by his regiment on Sept. 29, 1918. They found 4 privates, also lost in the smoke and fog, and, with this small party, proceeded toward the objective. During their advance they surprised and captured 92 Germans, including several officers, without other aid. They succeeded in getting all of the prisoners back to the military police, and then rejoined their platoon.

Colonel, 122d Artillery, 33d Division.

When the advance of the Infantry was held up by heavy fire from hostile machine guns and artillery, which his artillery was unable to locate and neutralize, Colonel Foreman personally advanced by creeping through a heavy enemy artillery barrage to a point in the Infantry front line where he could by direct visual observation locate the position of enemy machine guns. Remaining at this post exposed to a terrific hostile bombardment, he transmitted information to the supporting artillery and directed their fire on hostile strong points until the advance of the Infantry line was effected.

Private, first class, Company A, 59th Infantry, 4th Division.
After several other soldiers had been killed in attempting to carry a message across an open field under intense enemy fire, Private Formica volunteered for this perilous mission and successfully accomplished it. Corporal, Machine Gun Company, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
After all the officers of his company had been wounded, Corporal Foust assumed command, and with great courage and bravery organized a detachment, recapturing two of his machine guns that had fallen to the enemy in a counter-attack carlier in the day.

Sergeant, sanitary detachment, 126th Infantry, 32d Division.
Under harassing machine-gun fire and in plain view of the enemy Sergeant Fowle voluntarily went forward a distance of 150 yards to dress the wounds of an officer. He returned for assistance, after which he removed the officer to a place of safety.

Second lieutenant, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. On Oct. 2 he led his men into an advance trench and cleared it of the enemy without a casualty. That night he went out alone and killed the crew of a machine-gun nest with bombs. During the attack on Blanc Mont the following morning he led his men, capturing about 80 prisoners and 15 machine guns. After consolidating his position on Blanc Mont, he went out alone and, while exposed to artillery fire, sniped the crew of a machine-gun nest.

Private, first class, Company B, 120th Infantry, 30th Division. He remained at his post, covering the withdrawal of his company with his automatic rifle, in order that the company might take up a better position. He was instantly killed while in the performance of this mission. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. John W. Fowler:

Captain, Medical Corps, attached to 353d Infantry, 89th Division.
Although he was suffering from the effects of gas, Captain Fox maintained his battalion dressing station under a terrific bombardment of gas and highestplosive shells, which had almost demolished his station, continuing to care for the wounded and refusing to be evacuated until blindness rendered him unable to work.

Sergeant, 17th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He volunteered and carried an important message across a heavily shelled area, returning through a barrage to report the result of his mission. Later, after being wounded, he remained on duty for four hours, carrying messages across a field swept by machine-gun fire.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 120th Field Artillery, 32d Division.
He, with other soldiers, made frequent trips to maintain telephone communication between battalion and regimental headquarters during a destructive bombardment. All other lines had been destroyed, and as this line was used by both Infantry and Artillery for communication with the rear, it was of utmost importance that it be maintained.

Corporal, Company F, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.
Corporal Fox exposed himself to machine-gun fire to rescue a wounded comrade who lay in an exposed position. While crawling out to bring in his comrade he was under direct enemy observation and bursts of machine-gun fire.

Corporal, Battery F, 104th Field Artillery, 27th Division.

While the battery position was being subjected to severe bombardment of gas and high-explosive shells, Corporal Fox, in an effort to rescue two wounded comrades, extinguished a pile of burning camouflage, which was used as a cover for the ammunition and fuses. While fighting the burning camouflage the ammunition was exploded by another bursting shell.

Private, 16th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Under constant shell and machine-gun fire for three days he performed his duties as runner with exceptional courage and daring, establishing efficient service between company and battalion headquarters.

Private, first class, Company F, 306th Infantry, 77th Division.

He voluntarily exposed himself to intense machine-gun and artillery fire, crawling forward, in company with four other men of his company, in search of their wounded company commander who had fallen a short distance in front of his company's position. After a fruitless search for the wounded officer, the patrol engaged the nearest enemy post and in a fight with hand grenaded destroyed it. Private Foy then assisted a wounded comrade to return to his own line. The heroic conduct of Private Foy greatly encouraged the men of his courseavy inciting them to hardie endeavor. of his company, inciting them to heroic endeavor.

Corporal, Battery E, 76th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
While acting as chief of section during an important firing, Corporal Francis was mortally wounded by an enemy shell which rendered all but one of the section casualties. Although suffering great pain, he directed the remaining members of the gun crew in the firing until he was relieved.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Catherine Francis.

Private, Company M, 132d Iufantry, 33d Division.
Private Francisco displayed remarkable heroism and leadership. During the afternoon the enemy made three strong counter-attacks, and it was during these attacks that Private Francisco gathered together fragments of squads and assumed command of them. He led them against the enemy, approaching from the rear of the right flank, and was personally responsible for the capture of four machine guns and five prisoners.

Corporal, Machine Gun Company, 38th Infantry, 3d Division. Corporal Frank, with an officer and another soldier of his company, attacked a patrol of seven Germans who had captured four American soldiers, killed one of the Germans and captured the others.

Sergeant, 82d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He showed exceptional bravery and coolness in leading his platoon against superior numbers of the enemy strongly fortified in a machine-gun nest, which he captured and held.

First licutenant, 20th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
While flying in the rear of a formation, returning from a bombing raid, Licutenant Frank's machine was attacked by three hostile planes (Fokker type).
Licutenant Frank was wounded and rendered unconscious early in the encounter, but upon recovering, he shot down a Fokker which was attacking the leader of the formation, and drove off two others which were pressing him from the side.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Paul A. Frank.

Private, Headquarters Company, 30th Infantry, 3d Division. On the night of July 14-15 he voluntered and earried messages through heavy shellfire after other runners had been killed in the attempt to perform the same mission.

Corporal, Company II, 31st Infantry.

He distinguished himself on numerous occasions by his capabilities and extraordinary daring as a patrol leader while under fire, notably at Novo Litovsk on August 8, 1919, when he rushed the door of a hut occupied by the enemy, who were firing directly at him.

Sergeant, Battery F, 10th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
Responding to a call for volunteers, Sergeant Frary, with 8 other soldiers, manned 2 guns of a French hattery which had been deserted by the French during the unprecedented fire after many casualties had been inflicted on their forces. For 2 hours he remained at his post and poured an effective fire into the ranks of the enemy,

First licutenant, 16th Infantry, 1st Division. With four men, Licutenant Fraser captured a machine-gun nest which was delivering an annihilating fire upon his company and holding up its advance.

Captain, Quartermaster Corps, 5th Division.

He was directing a working party which was being heavily bombarded. Having been ordered to safety, he, thinking only of the welfare of his men, went forth to see that all had found shelter, and was instantly killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Mary E. Fraser.

Disposing of his force with excellent judgment, Major Frasier himself conducted an assault that routed the enemy, driving him from the field in complete disorganization. Later in the action, when wounded, he refused to relinquish command and continued to direct the operations of his battalion until he had placed his troops on their final objective. objective.

Private, Company F, 61st Infantry, 5th Division.
When telephone communications had been cut off Private Fratus volunteered to carry messages to the battalion commander. Though he was wounded in passing through an intense artillery barrage, he succeeded in delivering the messages.

Corporal, Company II, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

while under heavy enemy machine-gun fire, Corporal Fray charged a machine gun single-handed, putting it out of action, and dispersing its crew. Later, as the raiding party withdrew, he assisted in carrying back the wounded.

First licutenant, 9th Infantry, U. S. Army. He displayed conspicuous gallantry and absolute disregard of personal safety in rescuing, under a terrific enemy fire, the colonel of his regiment, who had fallen mortally wounded.

Second lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Killed in action at Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he gave the supreme proof of that extraordinary heroism which will serve as an example to hitherto untried troops.

In attempting this most hazardous task he was killed.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Conrad G. Free.

Captain, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.

Under a heavy hostile artillery fire and fire from low-flying airplanes, he rallied and reorganized scattered elements of his own and another company and courageously led them in the face of heavy machine-gun fire against a strong machine-gun nest, killed and wounded several of the crew and captured the gun.

Corporal, Company D, 167th Infantry, 42d Division. He conducted himself with marked bravery as a member of a patrol of 5 men which encountered an enemy patrol of 11 men, which it attacked and routed, taking 2 prisoners.

Sergeant, Company B, 306th Infantry, 77th Division.

He displayed exceptional courage and bravery while leading his platoon against enemy machine-gun and trench-mortar positions and putting them out of action. Although wounded, this soldier remained on duty with his platoon, killing and capturing several of the enemy and finally occupying part of the hostile trench.

Sergeant, Company F, 128th Infantry, 32d Division. 1 of 4 survivors of a platoon of 41 who attacked Hill 269, he, with the 3 others, continued on their mission and held the hill for some time without hope of reinforcements.

Second lieutenant, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.

Although wounded early in an advance, he went forward with his men until he fell from loss of blood. He refused to be evacuated, and, while his wounds were being treated on the spot, preparatory to resuming the advance, was killed by shell fire.

Captain Frey was seriously wounded while bringing his support platoons forward during a raid on his sector by the enemy, but gallantly continued to lead his men in the repulse of the raid until carried from the field by the stretcher bearers an hour later.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Mrs. Louisa Hofer.

Private, Headquarters Company, 316th Infantry, 79th Division.

Acting as runner, Private Frey was sent from regimental headquarters to the front lines. On the way he was severely wounded by a fragment shell, but he continued on, despite weakness from loss of blood and dazed from shock. He delivered his message before being evacuated.

Private, first class, Company C, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

Private Frey advanced beyond the front lines in order to locate an enemy machine-gun group who were raking the valley with their fire. Upon his approach the crew abandoned their gun and retreated into a wood. Private Frey pursued them into the shelter of the woods, firing upon them as he advanced. Upon returning he discovered a wounded comrade lying about 50 yards in advance of our lines in a place exposed to heavy fire. Private Frey went to this wounded man and carried him to a place of safety.

Corporal, Company K, 145th Infantry, 37th Division.

In full view of the enemy and under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire, Corporal Friel, with two other men, swam the Escaut River and assisted in the construction of a footbridge. The construction of this bridge aided materially in the later successful operations of American troops in this vicinity.

Private, Company A, 30sth Infantry, 77th Division.

He was on duty as a battalion runner during the period of six days in which his own and another battalion were surrounded by the enemy in the Argonne Forest, France, and cut off from communication with friendly troops. Although he was without food and, toward the end of the period, almost exhausted, this soldier carried messages to all parts of the position. Constantly under heavy fire from machine guns and trench mortars, he showed an utter disregard for his own personal safety. On the night of Oct. 5, 1918, he was sent to carry a message through the enemy lines to regimental headquarters. Several other attempts had been made, as this soldier knew, which had resulted in the death or capture of the runners. He made the attempt, but was killed in the performance of his mission by the enemy fire. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Mary J. Friel.

Captain, Cavalry, attached to 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
He was continually at the head of his company in the attack on Hill 212, near Sergy, and was constantly exposed to the terrific enemy fire while leading his men forward. After the objective had been gained and the men had dug in on the crest of the hill, he remained on watch the entire night, constantly patrolling his company sector under the heavy rific, machine-gun, and artillery fire from the enemy's lines. He was later killed while on a hazardous reconnaissance in the vicinity of Juvigny, France.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Meade Frierson, sr.

Private, medical detachment, 319th Infantry, 80th Division.

For two days and nights he worked incessantly as the only first-ald man with two companies in the front line. On several occasions he went out in front of our lines under heavy enemy fire to aid wounded men and to help bring them back to our line, his pack and equipment being badly torn by pieces of shrapnel.

Private, Company I, 16th Infantry, 1st Division. While attached to a machine-gun company as an ammunition carrier, Private Fritz, after being twice wounded, continued to carry ammunition while exposed to heavy shell fire.

Corporal, Company K, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
He accompanied a party of 10 men which attacked a ravine infested with enemy machine-gun nests. During the exploit all except Corporal Fritz and one comrade were killed or wounded, but they succeeded in silencing enough guns to make further advance possible.

Private, Company M, 117th Infantry, 36th Division.
When his platoon was held up by an enemy machine-gun post, Private Fritz, with another soldier, took their automatic rifle and rushed forward through intense fire, skillfully placed the rifle in position, and opened an effective fire.

First lieutenant, 38th Infantry, 3d Division. While making a personal reconnaissance in front of our lines he was seriously wounded, but crawled to the rear to a patrol with valuable information. He ordered that he be left behind and that the patrol return with the information he had obtained. The patrol returned and he, unable to resist by fighting, was later taken prisoner by the advancing enemy.

Corporal, Company D, 361st Infantry, 91st Division. He voluntarily and unhesitatingly left shelter under heavy shellfire and, without thought of personal danger, rendered first aid and carried a wounded comrade to a place of safety.

First lieutenant, 103d Aero Squadron, Air Service.
While on patrol duty with two other pilots in enemy territory Lieutenant Frost attacked an enemy formation of eight planes (type Fokker). He attacked at close range, and after a severe combat succeeded in sending one enemy down in flames. With his comrades, they destroyed in all four planes, and by repeated attacks dispersed the remainder.

Captain, Medical Corps, U. S. Army.

For extraordinary heroism in action while in command of a hospital train in eastern Siberia on June 12, 1919, from June 13 to June 18, 1919, and on June 25, 1919, for his expeditious treatment and care of wounded and the skillful handling of a hospital train while under fire.

Private, 97th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Private Frye, a platoon runner, fearlessly exposed himself in carrying important messages through a heavy enemy barrage.

Corporal, Company B, 9th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division. Corporal, Fuhrman, without regard to personal safety, operated and advanced his machine gun under intense enemy artillery and machine-gun fire. By this act he disabled and put out of action two enemy machine-gun crews which were holding up the advance of the infantry.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Paul C. Fuhrman.

Supply sergeant, Company C, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.

Accompanied by one other soldier, Sergeant Fuller flanked two machine-gun nests, killed seven of the enemy, and captured four machine-guns, thereby making it possible for two companies of his battahion to enter the woods and continue the advance.

Captain, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
While fearlessly exposing himself in an artillery barrage for the purpose of getting his men into a position of security in the attack on Bois-de-Belleau, on June 12, 1918, he was killed and thereby gave his life in an effort to protect his men. Posthumously awarded. Award made to father, Col. B. H. Fuller.

Sergeant, Battery D, 109th Field Artillery, 28th Division. He left an observation post to aid in the rescue of an officer who had fallen in a field swept by artillery and machine-gun fire. After administering first aid he carried the officer to a place of safety, his prompt action saving the officer's life.

Second lieutenant, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.

When his company was temporarily halted by heavy machine-gun fire, Second Lieutenant Fuller personally led a group of 10 men in an attack on the machine-gun position. He was killed while leading this attack, but due to his heroic example the enemy position was captured and his company was able to continue its advance.

Ret by merchy expedded. Meddl presented to father Arthur O. Fuller.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Arthur O. Fuller.

Private, Company II, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.

During an attack on a strong enemy position, in the face of heavy fire from artillery and machine guns, Private Fuller, a runner, worked uncessingly throughout the attack in maintaining lateral liaison between units. The entire route which he was obliged to travel was exposed to heavy fire from the enemy, and on one of his trips he succeeded in locating a machine-gun nest which had been inflicting heavy losses on our troops. Returning through a rain of bullets, he reported the exact position of the emplacement, which enabled the artillery to demolish it.

Corporal, Company M, 137th Infantry, 35th Division.
With another soldier he left a shell hole and advanced under heavy machinegun fire, rescued one of our wounded soldiers, and took him to a dressing station. He showed marked heroism, the mission being undertaken against the advice of his platoon leader.

Private, first class, Battery C, 129th Field Artillery, 35th Division. When the rest of the gun squad was wiped out by heavy shelling and he himself had been wounded, he continued to fire his piece single handed until another gun squad was formed.

Mechanic, Company I, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.

He was acting as a stretcher bearer for his company, which was suffering many essualties as it advanced. While he was carrying a wounded soldier, he was himself seriously wounded in the shoulder. He continued, under heavy artillery fire, to evacuate the wounded until he fell from exhauston.

Private, 8th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Private Funk, together with his corporal, advanced under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire to a forward position, where Private Funk operated the machine gun, doing great damage to the enemy. These two remained with their gun in a far-advanced position alone until their ammunition was exhausted.

Private, Company H, 370th Infantry, 93d Division. ()
When Private Fuquay, an automatic-rifle man, was stationed at a particularly dangerous location his rifle became jammed, whereupon he took it apart, remedied the trouble, and again put it into operation. While doing this he was wounded in the left arm, but refused first aid, continuing to serve his piece and direct the fire on the enemy positions until completely exhausted from loss of blood.

First lieutenant, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.

Although wounded, he continued in action as leader of a platoon and by his heroic conduct stimulated his men to success until incapacitated by a second wound.

Sergeant, Company H, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.

Although himself slightly wounded while near enemy wire entanglements, which position was boxed in by a hostile artillery barrage and swept by enemy machine guns, Sergeant Furey, with utter disregard for his own safety voluntarily exposed himself to a great danger in going to the ald of a comrade, who was severely wounded in both legs, bandaging his wounds and assisting him to the first-aid station, all under heavy hostile fire. He then rejoined his command near the forst line. In the performance of this gallant set he was command near the front line. In the performance of this gallant act he was again wounded.

Private, Company B, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.

With 3 other soldiers he charged and captured a battery of three. 77 field pieces which, protected by machine guns, were firing point-blank on the position held by his company. This deed enabled his company to continue the advance.

First lieutenant, pilot, 103d Aero Squadron, Air Service. Lieutenant Furlow, while leading a patrol of 3 monoplace planes at an altitude of 400 meters, met and attacked an enemy patrol of 7 monoplace planes. Despite numerical superiority, he destroyed 2 of the enemy's planes, and with the aid of his companions forced the others to withdraw. Oak-leaf cluster.

Oak-real culster.

An oak leaf is awarded Lieutenant Furlow for the following act of extraordinary heroism in action in the region of Verneville, France, Sept. 17, 1918: Lieutenant Furlow, while on patrol with 2 other companions, met and attacked an enemy formation of 8 planes. In the course of the combat which ensued, Lieutenant Furlow's plane was severely damaged by the enemy's fire. Despite the damage, he continued the attack until he had destroyed I hostile aircraft and with his patrol forced the remainder of the enemy to retire.

First lieutenant, 7th Field Artillery, 1st Division.

Performing his duties as liaison officer in a most effective manner, he also took command of Infantry platoons, after the officers had become casualties, and led them brilliantly. On one occasion he reorganized a platoon after the leader had been killed, and attacked a strong machine-gun position, capturing 4 guns and 15 prisoners.

Private, 82d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Unaided, Private Furr crept forward in advance of his line, searched an underground tunnel, captured 5 Germans, and brought them back through heavy machine-gun and shell fire.

Sergeant, Headquarters Detachment, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

He remained in a building subjected to heavy shell fire and mustard gas and made coffee for wounded men until the building was almost entirely demolished by the enemy shell fire.

First lieutenant, 316th Infantry, 79th Division.

Between 6.30 and 9 o'clock he fought with 2 platoons through a dense thicket against an unlocated enemy, who resisted with constant artillery and machine gun fire. The 2 officers of the platoons on his left were killed, as well as his gun fire. The 2 officers of the platoons on his left were killed, as well as his accompanying officer, Lieut. Rudolph E. Peterson. Although his men were decimated, he rallied them four separate times and took command of the men originally on his left after their officers were killed, and renewed his assaults against hidden machine-gun nests on Hill 370. His small group silenced 7 machine guns and captured several prisoners. He reached his objective—Hill 370—in spite of terrific losses, definitely located the enemy, which was the main purpose of the reconnaissance, and assisted in the capture of 7 machine-gun nests. The extraordinary courage of Lieutenant Gabriel, his coolness, and superb devotion to duty served as a constant inspiration to every man of the 316th Infantry Regiment.

Sergeant, Company K, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.

When his company had been held up by a sweeping fire from a machine-gun nest, Sergeant Gaddis, in charge of a patrol of 5 men, went forward to reduce the nest. The patrol was once driven back by the terrific fire, but again advanced. 15 feet from the nest 2 guns opened fire, killing 3 of the patrol, whereupon Sergeant Gaddis rushod forward alone and killed the crews of both guns with hand grenades. His action not only made possible the advance of the line, which was of extreme importance, but also saved many of his comrades at a time when his company had suffered heavy casualties.

Private, Company F, 108th Infantry, 27th Division. He displayed rare courage in leaving shelter and going into an open field under heavy shell and machine-gun fire and rescuing wounded soldiers of another regiment.

Oak-leaf cluster.

An oak-leaf cluster, to be worn with the distinguished-service cross, is awarded Private Gaffey for the following act of extraordinary heroism in action near Ronssoy, France, Sept. 29, 1918: When all the other members of his squad had been killed or wounded, he picked up an automatic rifle and advanced alone against an enemy position.

Captain, Medical Corps, attached to 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

Conspicuous for his courage in the actions at Rambucourt on Mar. 17, 1918, and at Cantigny, May 28, 1918, he gave inspiration to the officers and men of the command by his extraordinary heroism throughout the operations south of Soissons, July 18 to 22, 1918, and especially at Berzy-le-Sec, July 21, 1918, when he accompanied the first line and attended the wounded in the open wider in except the property of the command of the comma under incessant machine-gun and artillery fire.

First lieutenant, 28th Infantry, 1st Division. He was severely wounded by machinegun fire shortly after successfully leading his platoon to its objective. Notwithstanding this, he remained on duty for nine hours, thereby setting a brave example for his men.

Second lieutenant, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.
He stayed with his command and led it to its final objective near Soissons, France, July 20, 1918, after being wounded, directed the consolidation of his position, and yielded his post only at the command of a superior officer.

Colonel, 147th Infantry, 37th Division.

When an enemy counterattack was imminent he went into the front lines under a violent artillery and machine-gun barrage, and by the coolness and certainty of his orders and the inspiring example of his personal courage reorganized his own command and took command of other units whose officers had been lost or diverted in the confusion of battle. Knocked down by a shell, he refused to be evacuated and continued to carry on the work of reorganizing his position and disposing the troops to a successful conclusion.

Captain, 131st Infantry, 33d Division

Although painfully wounded while his company was advancing to the final objective, he courageously continued to lead the company and later directed the front-line operations of his battalion until the line was organized. Captain Gale was continuously under heavy shell and machine-gun fire while moving back and forth along the line, and the example of his coolness and bravery was an inspiration to his men.

Private, Company C, 8th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.
When the attack on Hill 241 was held up, Private Gale led a few infantrymen and machine gunners forward under artillery and machine-gun fire to establish a new line about a kilometer in advance of our front lines. He was mortally wounded while making the dash forward.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, George H. Gale.

Private, Company A, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.

Corporal, Company C, 1st Engineers, 1st Division.
While his battalion was defending a hill captured from the enemy, Corporal Gallagher was placed on the extreme right of the line nearest to the enemy, when an enemy counterattack was launched against their position. On account of the severe casualties inflicted, orders were given to withdraw. Remaining alone at his post after the withdrawal, Corporal Gallagher valiantly resisted the attack, advancing about 30 yards, when he saw the enemy strip the body of his dead commanding officer. Later, when his company drove the enemy beyond the former position, they found the body of Corporal Gallagher lying across his rifle. In a circle facing him were the bodies of 6 Germans, whose lives he exacted during the unequal struggle.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Thomas B. Gallagher.

Sergeant, first class, Company A, 2d Engineers, 2d Division.

He showed great bravery and energy and exceptional presence of mind in leading his platoon through a heavy barrage fire to reinforce a weakened section of the line. Further, after the capture of a hill which was his objective, he pursued a German officer, although exposed to heavy fire, captured him, took away his arms, and brought him back a prisoner.

First lieutenant, 23d Infantry, 2d Division. Lieutenant Galloway exhibited exceptional courage and leadership when, after being mortally wounded, he continued to direct the steady advance of his platoon in the face of heavy machine-gun fire until struck a second time and killed.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Jane R. Galloway.

Sergeant, Company II. 128th Infantry, 32d Division. He displayed remarkable leadership and courage in keeping the men together and calm under the terrific enemy artillery and machine-gun fire during the attack on Nov. 10, 1918. Although gassed and exhausted, he refused to go to the rear for medical treatment and remained with the company, assisting in giving first aid to the wounded and arranging for their evacuation, disregarding personal danger and displaying a fine spirit of sacrifice.

Sergeant, first class, section No. 606, Ambulance Service. He showed conspicuous conrage and devotion to duty in evacuating the wounded under the most trying conditions. He made repeated trips in plain view of enemy observers over roads under continuous shell fire. He was killed by a shell fragment while riding in an ambulance to an advanced post. When 2 enemy airplanes flew parallel to our Infantry lines north of the River Ourcq, near Villers-sur-Fere, France, July 28, 1918, pourning machine-gun bullets into our positions and driving everyone to cover, he rushed to his machine gun and took aim at the upper of the 2 machines. Although he was constantly subject to a storm of bullets from the planes and from enemy snipers on the ground, he nevertheless coolly sighted his gun and riddled the upper plane. It collapsed and fell in flames, striking the lower one as it fell

Major, 18th Machine Gun Battalion, 6th Division. Major Garey organized and led a combat patrol which penetrated the enemy lines and returned with several prisoners. Although exposed to machine-gun fire and later grenade fire from a superior number of the enemy, he conducted his patrol so as to accomplish its mission and returned to our lines with valuable information.

Sergeant, Company I, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
Organizing a platoon of survivors of a battalion, he led them in attack against the enemy. Under terrific shell and machine-gun fire, he advanced against an enemy machine-gun nest and, by the effective use of hand grenades, killed or wounded the crew and destroyed the gun.

Corporal, Company C, 125th Infantry, 32d Division. When two companies of another organization deployed in a field, a violent artillery fire was directed on them, necessitating their moving into an adjoir-ing wood, leaving their dead and wounded on the field. Corporal Gariepy, with a party of five men, left the woods and directed the work of carrying the wounded to a safe spot, where they could be given medical attention. Ho directed this work under heavy fire and with an utter disregard for his own life. Garlington, Creswell

Lieutenant colonel, General Staff, 77th Division.

In preparation for attack by units of his division he helped establish an advance observation post. Learning a wounded officer was in front, Lieutenant Colonel Garlington made his way twice through intense fire from artillery and small arms to where the wounded officer lay and assisted in carrying him to safet

Private, Company C, 105th Field Signal Battalion, 30th Division.

Attached to the headquarters of the 60th Infantry Brigade as a dispatch rider, he repeatedly showed exceptional bravery throughout the operations of that brigade. During the engagement near Bellicourt he particularly distinguished himself by his prompt delivery of all messages under vigorous shellfire and bombing raids by enemy aircraft, riding day and night in all kinds of weather.

Private, Company D, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

When a German 77-millimeter gun, supported by numerous machine guns, broke the tank attack and held up the Infantry advance, Private Garner, with two scouts, made an encircling novement amid heavy fire and put the gun out of action, capturing the entire crew. They then cleaned out the enemy dugouts in the vicinity and returned with 40 prisoners, including an officer

Sergeant, Company F, 325th Infantry, 82d Division.
Although wounded in the face and hand, he went 50 meters up a road in the face of fire from two German machine guns and of exploding grenades to rescue a lieutenant who lay 100 meters within the German wire, so severely wounded as to be unable to move without assistance. Sergeant Garner put the officer on his back, crawled back through the enemy's wire, and from there carried him 500 meters across open ground, under fire, to safety.

Corporal, Company D, 2d Engineers, 2d Division.

Advancing ahead of our infantry, he made a reconnaissance of the town of St.

Etienne-a-Arnes; and, in spite of the danger, exposed to artillery and machinegun fire of our own and enemy guns, he procured and returned with valuable information.

Private, Signal Corps platoon, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.

He displayed great personal bravery and skill in maintaining telephone lines between the regimental commander and the leading battalion for more than two days. He patrolled the line continuously and repaired it when it was cut during bombardment. Knocked down frequently by exploding shells, and once buried beneath dirt and débris, he nevertheless stuck courageously to his task, thereby making communication possible.

Private, first class, Company C, 354th Infantry, 89th Division.
When his company was advancing across an open field an enemy machine gun opened fire upon it from the left front. Private Garrity and two other soldiers being on that flank of the company immediately advanced upon it. His two comrades were shot down, but Private Garrity advanced alone at a run and with his bayonet drove the three Germans from their guns into a nearby dugout, captured them and the gun.

Private, Company F, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.
On duty as a company runner, he repeatedly carried messages unflinchingly through heavy enemy machine-gun and shell fire with utter disregard for personal safety.

Corporal, Company II, 47th Infantry, 4th Division. Responding to a call for volunteers to destroy a hostile machine gun, Corporal Clarst, with two other soldiers, boldly went forward through machine-gun fire and accomplished this mission.

Private, Company M, 307th Infantry, 77th Division. He distinguished himself time after time, carrying in wounded under heavy shellfire until he was finally killed while engaged in this self-sacrificing work. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Laura Garthright.

Private, Company C, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

After the advance of his company had been stopped by strong hostile machinegun fire, Private Garvin, with three companions, advanced far ahead of the front line to attack an enemy position located in a large farmhouse. By skillful maneuvering in the broad daylight, they covered all entrances to the house and forced the surrender of the entire force of the enemy, numbering 36 men and 2 officers. During the exploit they killed two Germans who attempted to take cover in the cellar.

Corporal, Company B, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.

Corporal Gasaway, accompanied by three other soldiers, volunteered and went out under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire to rescue a wounded comrade. Failing in the first attempt, they again tried, and this time succeeded in bringing the wounded man to shelter.

When the advance of his company was held up by two machine-gun nests, he led his squad, entirely on his own initiative. in the face of intense machine-gun fire, against an enemy post on the right flank. Followed by his men, he rushed the position, taking it and killing two of the gun crew. He then rushed a second post alone with his rifle, killing one of the crew. He was himself killed before he could reach the post.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, F. W. Gaskins.

Private, Company B, 119th Infantry, 30th Division. During the operations against Bellicourt he, without assistance, charged an enemy position, taking and returning with 26 prisoners Private, Company H, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.

After being severely wounded by shrapnel he showed the greatest courage by continuing to advance on a machine-gun emplacement, keeping the gun occupied, and thereby enabling a detachment to flank the position and capture it.

Sergeant, sanitary detachment, 121st Machine Gun Battalion, 32d Division. During the attack on Bellevue Farm he worked energetically throughout the engagement, which continued from 2 to 10 p. m., to give first aid to the wounded and to carry them to the dressing station. He was under fire of snipers continuously and frequently went into shell and machine-gun fire to administer to wounded soldiers. His calmness and courage was a source of inspiration to the couplet traces. of inspiration to the combat troops.

Corporal, Company F, 141st Infantry, 36th Division.
He, leading his squad, made three attempts to take an enemy's machine-gun nest under enflading fire. In the final attempt he was wounded, but continued to advance until he was killed by machine-gun fire.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Lilly Gaston.

Corporal, Company I, 47th Infantry, 4th Division.

He showed exceptional courage and judgment when patrolling the country to the flank of his company under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire. He obtained liaison with the flank company and brought back valuable information regarding the river to the front of our lines.

Private, Company M, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
He went forward with three other soldiers, and, though subjected to intense enemy fire, rescued a wounded soldier who had fallen in advance of our lines.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. George Duff.

First lieutenant, 30th Infantry, 3d Division. When his small force of about 30 men was almost entirely surrounded by greatly superior forces of the enemy, Lieutenant Gay, refusing to surrender, cut his way out by delivering a deadly fire from both his front and rear. He also captured about 150 prisoners, including a major, and his remarkable gallantry aided greatly in breaking up the German drive of July 15.

Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 101st Field Artillery, 26th Division. As a sergeant in charge of an artillery observation post and rocket relay station during an intensive bombardment of gas shells, after a direct hit had been made on his observatory he evacuated all his men, but he, himself, though badly gassed, continued for 6 hours and until relieved to observe the enemy's fire and relay calls for harrages. He died shortly after being evacuated thus sacrificing his life to save the men under his command, his extraordinary heroism and devotion to duty under a continuous bombardment of high explosives being a great inspiration to the men of his regiment.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Henry H. Gay.

Private, Company L, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.
As Private Gay and another soldier were going to the rear to guide the remainder of their company to its position they were fired on from an enemy machine-gun nest. Attacking the nest, they killed 4 of the crew and captured 1 prisoner, driving off the remainder.

First lieutenant, pilot, 1st Day Bombardment Group, Air Service. While leading an important mission with 2 other planes, he was attacked by 15 enemy planes. Nevertheless, he and his observer carried out the mission, bombed the objective in a running fight, and shot down at least 1 enemy plane.

Private, Company C, 105th Infantry, 27th Division. He exhibited exceptional bravery in voluntarily leaving shelter, going forward under heavy shell and machine-gun fire and bringing back to our lines several wounded comrades.

Private, 82d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He volunteered and went forward to reconnoiter a ravine which was infested with hostile machine-gun and artillery positions, returning with several prisoners.

First lieutenant, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.

During the attack, when his company was debouching from a wood, his men were suddenly exposed to direct fire of a 150-millimeter gun some 200 meters to the front. Lieutenant Gibson rushed toward the enemy guns, killing two gunners before other members of his organization joined him and completed the capture of the guns.

Sergeant, Company II, 370th Infantry, 93d Division. Sergeant Gibson led his platoon across a fire-swept zone in the advance of the objective, encouraging his men by his fearless example. On the same day he was placed in charge of two important reconnoitering patrols whose mission was to locate enemy machine-gun positions that were known to be in the path of the advance of the company. He accomplished the mission, constantly exposed to enemy fire, and brought back important information.

Corporal, 83d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He handled alone a Chauchat rifle with such accuracy in the face of an extremely heavy fire that his plateen was enabled to move against the enemy machine-

First lieutenant, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.

He displayed rare gallantry and leadership when, all the other officers of his company having been killed or wounded, he led his men through a zone of intense bombardment, and, although badly wounded binself, he attained his objective with only 5 men and 2 machine guns, refusing to be evacuated until his guns were effectively in action.

Private, Company I, 132d Infantry, 33d Division. Frivate, Company 1, 182d Infantry, 33d Division.

He administered first aid to many comrades under heavy shellfire and assisted them to the aid station. When his company was in need of water, he went alone under heavy machine-gun fire in direct view of the enemy and procured it. Each night he personally guided the ration detail through heavy bombardment. Toward the end of the engagement, after his platoon sergeant and the other noncommissioned officers had become casualties, Private Giescke took charge of the platoon, displaying unusual leadership.

First lieutenant, 114th Infantry, 29th Division. While leading his platoon in attack he was wounded, but refused evacuation, encouraging his men to continue, when he was again wounded. He then assisted in the removal of the wounded and refused attention until all others had received first aid.

First lieutenant, 307th Infantry, 77th Division. On Aug. 26 Lieutenant Gilbert made a daylight reconnaissance of the ruins of the Tannerie, near Fismes, entered Fismes under direct observation and fire of the enemy, and continued his reconnaissance along the Rouen-Reims read under machine-gun fire, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the terrain was favorable for an attack on the Chateau du Diable. On Nov. 10 he voluntarily led a patrol across the River Meuse and located the enemy positions.

First lieutenant, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
With utter disregard for his own safety, exposed to heavy enemy machine gun and rifle fire, he crossed open ground under enemy observation and less than 75 yards from the enemy line and rendered first aid to wounded members of his platoon, thus saving their lives and setting an example of bravery and devotion to duty to other members of his command.

Private, 55th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He volunteered to rescue a comrade from a most violent barrage. Although severely wounded while performing this courageous deed, he continued until his task was accomplished.

Corporal, Company E, 327th Infantry, 82d Division.
During the entire action from Oct. 7, he carried messages from the front line to battalion and regimental headquarters, although suffering from the effects of gas and sickness. On two occasions he volunteered and led patrols into the enemy territory, obtaining and returning with information of the utmost importance and value.

Second lieutenant, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

After the advance of his company had been held up by intense machine gun and ritle fire, he successfully gathered together the scattered members of his command and consolidated his position. He then exposed himself to great danger from heavy machine-gun fire by crawling far in advance of our lines and rescuing several wounded men who were lying helpless, unprotected in shall held. shell holes.

First lieutenant, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.

During the heavy enemy bombardment which preceded an enemy raid, Lieutenant Giles was twice buried by débris, due to enemy shell fire. Although suffering from concussion, he rallied his men and led them in a countersttack, repulsing the enemy, who had attempted to enter his platoon sector.

Captain, 345th Battalion, Tank Corps. Captain Gilfillan destroyed two machine guns and inflicted heavy losses on a column of German infantry after his tank had been on fire by two direct his by enemy artillery and he himself wounded by machine-gun fire. He left his tank only when an explosion was imminent, and was wounded a second time by shell fragments, but remained at his post until he had turned over his command to another officer.

ergeant, 167th Ambulance Company, 117th Sanitary Train, 42d Division. Sergeant, 167th Ambulance Company, 117th Sanuary Train, 42d Division. While the regimental dressing station was under heavy shellfire he volunteered to lead a squad of litter bearers to rescue several wounded men of another regiment who had been caught in a heavy barrage. Although he was wounded himself, he succeeded in leading the squad for a distance of 3 kilometers through a constant severe bombardment under direct observation of the enemy artillery and snipers to an outpost outside of his own regimental sector. He brought in one wounded officer and seven severely wounded soldiers without losing any of his men.

Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 120th Infantry, 30th Division.

After being twice wounded during the attack, Sergeant Gill, with his trench mortar section men, who had become lost from other companies, and stragglers, attacked a strong machine-gun position at the junction of the tunnel and canal and was wounded the third time. During the attack he was wounded in 13 places by machine-gun bullets and shrapnel, but continued the attack with the utmost coolness and bravery.

Private, first class, Company A, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
Displaying remarkable coolness and bravery under heavy artillery and machine gun fire, Private Gill volunteered in every way possible to assist in administering to the wounded. Going forward over a hazardous area, he brought in a wounded comrade to a place of safety.

Sergeant, Company D, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

During the advance of his company across the Vesle River, Sergeant Gill, disregarding severe wounds, insisted on leading a patrol to capture a sniper who was occupying a formidable position to fire on our men. While on this precarious mission he was killed.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Robinson Gill.

Passed assistant surgeon, U. S. Navy, attached to 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

He established a forward dressing station behind the advanced lines and for 15 hours treated the wounded and directed their evacuation while subjected to intense front and flank fire and in the absence of adequate shelter. His fearlessness under these conditions saved the lives of many wounded who would otherwise have been lost to the service. He disregarded personal danger and remained in an exposed position in order to give immediate care to the unfortunate.

Private, 148th Ambulance Company, 112th Sanitary Train, 37th Division. With two other soldiers he volunteered to rescue two wounded men who had been lying in an exposed position on the opposite bank of the Scheldt River for two days. Making two trips across the stream in the face of heavy mafor two days. Making two trips across the stream in the face of heavy machine gun and shell fire he and his companions succeeded in carrying both the wounded men to shelter.

Private, Machine Gun Company, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.

Locating an enemy sniper, Private Gillespie took the rifle of a dead comrade and, with no regard to personal safety, crawled forward under heavy machine-gun fire to a position far in advance of the assaulting wave. After an exchange of shots, he killed an enemy sniper who had killed or wounded several members of his battalion, and worked his way back to his own lines through an area swept by fire from near-by heights. When all of his officers several members of his battanon, and worked his way back to his own lines through an area swept by fire from near-by heights. When all of his offices had been evacuated he rallied the survivors of his company and held them to their task after another company had been sent up as relief. He aided materially in the repulse of a strong counterattack, although suffering from the effects of gas, refusing to be evacuated till he became exhausted and was carried from the field.

Private, Company G, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
While carrying a message from the support to the firing line he was severely wounded, but he continued on his mission and delivered his message.

First lieutenant, 148th Ambulance Company, 112th Sanitary Train, 37th Division.

While in command of a medical detachment working forward through the woods on the right flank of the 73d Brigade sector, Lieutenant Gillette encountered a large number of men in confusion who were without officers and under fire from enemy snipers located both at the edge of the woods and at a strong point on a knoll beyond it. By his remarkable courage and tact. and through the power of his inspiring heroic example, the scattered troops were reorganized into squad and platoon groups and took up a position from which they as part of a battalion later moved forward and drove the enemy from the woods and overcame the enemy's strong point.

First lieutenant, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.

Four times he led his company over the top during the battle of Soissons, France, July 18-22, 1918, and by his individual bravery inspired his men to 4 successful attacks.

Private, first class, medical detachment, 11th Field Artillery, 6th Division. He made repeated trips over a road which was under continuous shell fire, he being the only driver who would risk driving over this road. On one trip his ambulance was struck by a shell, which wounded him, killed one of his patients, and caused fresh wounds to several others, but he continued on duty, evacuating the wounded of his own and other organizations.

Private, first class, Company F, 1st Engineers, 1st Division. He displayed exceptional courage when he carried messages through an area under intense shell and machine-gun bombardment after 4 men had lost their lives in the attempt.

Private, Battery E, 12th Field Artillery, 2d Division.
While acting as spare cannoneer, he sprang at a word from his executive officer to act as No. I of the supplementary gun crew for the first piece, whose entire crew were casualties. He assisted in laying aside the dead and wounded and continued in the service of his piece until the barrage had been completed.

Second lieutenant, 371st Infantry, 93d Division.

While personally reconnoitering a position to place his platoon in the defense of Trieres Farm, he, regardless of personal danger, exposed himself in an area swept by machine-gun fire and was killed while in the performance of this mission.

Bugler, Company B, 142d Infantry, 36th Division. In the assault of the 142d Infantry before the town of St. Etienne, Bugler Gilstrap voluntarily accompanied the first assaulting wave of his regiment. Under direct observation of the enemy he assisted many wounded men to shelter, with utter disregard for his own safety. Throughout the day he voluntarily carried messages from battalion to regimental headquarters through a zone swept by terrific enemy machine-gun, gas-shell, and high-explosive artillery fire. Repeatedly urged by officers and noncommissioned officers to a zone swept by terrific enemy machine-giin, gas-shell, and high-explosive artillery fire. Repeatedly urged by officers and noncommissioned officers to seek shelter, he coolly declined to do so, continuing on his dangerous missions in complete contempt for the bottest fire, until badly burned by gas-shell fire and evacuated to hospital. During the course of the day he found several enemy soldiers hiding in shell holes. These men he required to carry wounded American soldiers to dressing stations. The indomitable heroism, contempt for enemy fire, and superb devotion to duty of Bugler Gilstrap served as an example of soldierly bravery and conduct to every man of his regiment and inspired them all to the greatest endeavors.

Private, first class, Company C, 6th Engineers, 3d Division.
After being wounded, he was being evacuated when he discovered that all ammunition carriers of a near-by battery had been disabled. He insisted on being allowed to carry up ammunition until the battery was completely out of action.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Isaac Gilts.

Sergeant, Company F, 302d Engineers, 77th Division.
He voluntarily plunged into the Vesle River to rescue some soldiers who had fallen into the water with full packs while crossing a footbridge and were in danger of drowning. In order to see he removed his gas mask, and as a result was severely gassed.

First lieutenant, pilot 103d Aero Squadron, Air Service.
He, while on a patrol with four other scout planes, attacked an enemy formation of eight monoplane machines. Two of his companions were forced to retire when their guns became jammed. Despite numerical superiority, Lieutenant Giroux continued the attack, endeavoring to protect his leader, until finally forced down and killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Arthur E. Haley.

Corporal, Battery A, 109th Field Artillery, 28th Division.
Exposing himself to an artillery barrage, he occupied an exposed position to read projector signals from the Infantry front line. He volunteered for this duty and rendered valuable service, receiving and transmitting messages until he was so severely wounded that it was necessary for him to be evacnated.

First lieutenant, 316th Infantry, 79th Division.

Orders having been received at regimental headquarters to withdraw the troops to the Bois-de-Beuge, and a provisional battalion of the regiment occupying an advance position in which they were surrounded by enemy forces, the order for the retirement of the battalion was not delivered to the battalion commander. Later in the afternoon it was learned that an American between which they were the proof of the p battalion commander. Later in the afternoon it was learned that an American barrage would fall on the woods (Bois-de-Beuge) occupied by the battalion. Lieutenant Gotz volunteered to carry orders for the withdrawal of the battalion and, despite terriffic enemy machine-gun and artillery fire, he made his way over rough and broken country, accompanied voluntarily by Private Roy B. Andes. They accomplished their mission, returning with the battalion to the new position as the American shells commenced to fall upon the Bois-de-Beuge.

First licutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 119th Infantry, 30th Division. During the attack of Oct. 9 he established his aid post in a roadside shrine up with the front line, where he rendered valuable assistance to the wounded. On another occasion he established alone a post close to the front line, where he again gave treatment until the heavy fire of the enemy forced him to withdraw. During the advance of Oct. 18-19 he established another front-line post under the enemy fire and thus saved the lives of many of the troops.

Private, Headquarters Company, 138th Infantry, 35th Division.
Displaying marked heroism, he entered an enemy dugout alone, armed only with a pistol, and compelled the surrender of 18 Germans he encountered there. Exposing himself to intense machine-gun fire, he dressed the wounds of an officer, showing utter disregard of his personal danger. Later he compelled 4 German prisoners to carry a wounded officer to the rear.

Private, Company B, 6th Engineers, 3d Division.

He volunteered to leave shelter to rescue his patrol leader, who was lying wounded within sight of his lines. While engaged in this heroic work he came under hostile machine-gun fire and was killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Frank E. Goldcamp.

Private, Company C, 113th Infantry, 29th Division.

After his company had been forced to retire about 100 meters on account of a heavy barrage on its position, Private Golden worked his way through heavy shell and machine-gun fire to the position formerly held and succeeded in bringing a wounded comrade to a place of safety.

Private, Company D, 312th Infantry, 78th Division.
Disregarding the warning that to leave shelter meant almost certain death, Private Goldstein went to the aid of a wounded comrade, through an open field, exposed to murderous artillery and machine-gun fire. Bringing his comrade back to safety, he took a message from the wounded man's pocket and delivered it to its destination. Under cover of darkness he carried his comrade to a first-aid station.

First lieutenant, pilot, 24th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

In the course of a special reconnaissance to locate a hostile concentration massing for a counterattack in the vicinity of the Bois-de-Bantheville, he and his observer flew generally at an altitude of 400 meters, at times as low as 50 meters, 5 kilometers into the enemy's lines. Antiaircraft guns riddled his plane with bullets, pierced the gasoline tank, and drenched both pilot and observer. He continued on until the enemy's concentration was located and military information of great value secured. The bravery of Lieutenant Goldthwaite saved the lives of many American soldiers and brought large losses to the anemy. losses to the enemy.

First lieutenant, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
Lieutenant Goltra exhibited exceptional self-sacrifice and courage in the face of heavy machine-gun fire, promptly taking command of his platoon when its leader was killed, and fearlessly leading its advance. The second day of the attack he was killed while directing his platoon through a heavy German harrage.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Mrs. H. T. Willett.

Wagoner, Company D, 3d Ammunition Train, 3d Division.
While on duty with the 30th Infantry he saw an officer and two soldiers killed while attempting to remove company records, which were In danger of capture. He then left his dugout, succeeded in bringing up a truck, loaded what records he could, and after assisting several wounded men into the truck drove it out under heavy shellfire.

Second licutenant, 321st Machine Gun Battalion, 82d Division
When our forces were attacked on the right flank at Belair Farm, Licutenant Goodall defended this flank alone with his pistol, preventing the enemy from coming up the trenches until the Infantry could form to resist the attack.
Throughout a very trying and critical time this officer displayed utter disregard of personal dauger, and by his remarkable personal bravery inspired confidence among his own men and cooperating troops.

Private, section No. 554, Ambulance Service.
He volunteered and drove an ambulance at night, relieving men who were exhausted, and evacuated wounded from the most advanced posts under shellfire. On Oct. 5 he voluntarily went out and repaired an ambulance which had been damaged by a shell, in direct view of the enemy, who shelled the place continually as he worked. On Oct. 7 he repaired another car under the same circumstances, assuring the prompt evacuation of the wounded.

Private, Headquarters Company, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
As a runner for the Third Battalion, 125th Infantry, during the taking and holding of the line near La Tuilerie Farm, he was engaged in carrying important messages, crossing and recrossing Death Valley between Hill 258 and La Cote Dame Marie, the foremost part of the line held by the Third Battalion. The valley was swept by machine-gun fire, the terrain affording absolutely no protection, requiring a perilous dash of 500 yards across open ground before any cover was reached. It was only by a display of supreme courage that important messages reached the battalion.

Private, Company E, 315th Infantry, 79th Division. He volunteered to carry wounded to the first-aid station, through continuous shellfire. After he became too exhaused to carry more, he continued to help those who could walk with assistance.

Private, Company A, 2d Engineers, 2d Division.
On June 9, 1918, voluntarily carried an important message from Lucy-le-Bocage to Bouresches in daylight along an open road between the lines exposed to small-arms fire.

First lieutenant, 101st Infantry, 26th Division. Lieutenant Goodridge, with about 30 men, secured a footing in an advanced enemy treuch. The attacking battalion met with stubborn resistance and fell enemy treuch. The attacking battalion met with stubborn resistance and fell back to their starting point, but he tenaciously held his position until relieved on Nov. 11. His coolness and courage made it possible to hold this position, 800 meters in advance of our line, under intense machine-gun and artillery fire.

Sergeant, Company B, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
When his company was enfladed from the right by machine guns and could neither advance nor withdraw, he volunteered to go for assistance, after several runners had been killed in similar attempts. Crawling back through heavy machine-gun fire, he reached the trench-mortar battery, guided them forward, and himself operated one of the mortars which knocked out the enemy machine-gun nest, saving his company.

Sergeant, Company H, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
He was badly gassed on Sept. 26 and ordered to the hospital, but insisted on remaining at his post, despite the fact that he was suffering great pain. On Sept. 20 he was painfully wounded by shellfire, but again remained with his platoon, refusing to be evacuated. He efficiently performed his duties until his company was relieved.

Captain, 319th Infantry, 80th Division.

After the assaulting companies had passed over three machine-gun nests, which, not having been destroyed, opened heavy and effective fire, he reorganized scattered elements of his own company and of two others and fearlessly exposing himself to the fire of these guns, as well as that of our own artillery, personally led an attack on three nests and captured them, with 50 prisoners.

Private, first class, Battery F, 103d Field Artillery, 26th Division. He displayed conspicuous courage on Apr. 20, 1918, in voluntarily going to the aid of a wounded comrade, during which action he and the man he was assisting were killed.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Patrick R. Gordon.

Captain, 148th Ambulance Company, 112th Sanitary Train, 37th Division. Although in command of an ambulance company and not required to work so far forward, he voluntarily crossed the river and sought out wounded among the troops in the advance line. Finding two severely wounded men, he gave them first aid under withering machine-gun, rife, and shelfire, arranged such shelter for them as he could, then sought assistance to carry them on to safety. Returning with three men of his company, the bearers placed one of the wounded on an improvised litter, while the other was carried on the shoulders of the officer until the latter was exhausted. The fire becoming more intense, the wounded man was placed on the ground and encouraged by the officer to crawl to safety, the latter crawling beside him and protecting Captain, 148th Ambulance Company, 112th Sanitary Train, 37th Division. by the officer to crawl to safety, the latter crawling beside him and protecting him from the enemy's fire with his own body.

Sergeant, machine gun company, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.

Orders for his relief having ailed to reach him, Sergeant Gordon remained on duty all night, maintaining liaison between gun sections of his platoon, exposed to severe shellfire, from which he was gassed. He nevertheless stayed with his company, and whil going forward on Oct. 8 he fainted from the effects of the gas and was evacuated to the rear, unconscious. Regaining consciousness while en route to the casualty clearing station, he crawled out of the ambulance and worked his way back to his company without securing treatment. Though still suffering from weakness, he persistently refused to to be evacuated and took part in subsequent engagements with his platoon, until he was killed in action.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Dr. Thomas Gordon.

Sergeant, Company B, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
Sergeant Gorman, with four other soldiers, fearlessly attacked eight machinegun positions and succeeded, after stubborn resistance, in capturing both the guns and the crews.

Corporal, Company C, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
When he saw a soldier lying wounded about 200 yards in front of his trench, Corporal Gorman, without thought of personal danger, went out and brought him to safety, under terrific machine-gun fire from both sides and from the front.

Sergeant, Company B, 2d Field Signal Battalion, Ist Division.

After finishing the work of laying telephone lines on high ground, under heavy artillery fire and direct observation of the enemy, he ordered his men to shelter and remained behind to repair breaks caused by the shelling. He was killed a few minutes later by the explosion of a shell.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Anatole Gosselin.

First lieutenant, 128th Infantry, 32d Division.

After being severely wounded while leading an attack on a machine-gun nest, he continued to lead his platoon, in the face of severe machine-gun fire, remaining on duty all night upon reaching the final objective.

Private, Company C, 15th Machine Gun Battalion, 5th Division.
Refusing to be evacuated after being seriously wounded, he continued to earry messages through heavy machine-gun and shell fire. After becoming too weak to make trips by himself, he guided another runner and later assisted a wounded comrade to the rear.

Mechanic, Company K, 105th Infantry, 27th Division. Mechanic Gould, single-handed, attacked a heavy machine gun which was covering the retreat of the Germans and drove off the crew.

Private, first class, Company B, 307th Field Signal Battalion, 82d Division.
This soldier was in a relay station which was struck by a shell, wounding him and five others. After assisting the other wounded men to a truck near by, he returned through the falling shells to the relay station and assisted another soldier in repairing the wires which had been cut, remaining at his post until he had made sure that the lines were in good condition and he was ordered to come in by his commanding officer.

He was on duty continuously during this period at the most advanced marine post, assuring the prompt evacuation of the wounded and gassed. On the night of Oct. 5, hearing that several ambulances were needed to evacuate a number of wounded who were very close to the line, Corporal Graham, accompanied by the driver, passed over a road and across a field raked by machine-gun and shell fire and evacuated the wounded that were at this place, On Oct. 6 he worked under shellfire practically the whole day at an advanced post, superintending the leading of the ambulances and the rapid evacuation of the wounded. of the wounded.

Private, first class, Company B, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.

After repeated attempts had been made to rescue two wounded soldiers, who were lying within a hundred yards of the enemy lines, Sergeant Graham went out alone, over ground so swept by machine-gun and rille fire that 2 men had been killed previously in the attempt, and succeeded in bringing the 2 wounded soldiers to safety, showing by his valor and devotion to duty an excellent example to the men of the organization.

Sergeant, Company M, 339th Infantry, 85th Division (detachment in North

Sergeant Grahek voluntarily went forward about 150 yards in advance of our line, exposed to heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, and rescued a wounded comrade. Again, on Apr. 1, 1919, near Bolshe-Ozerka, Russia, he advanced alone with a Lewis gun against enemy snipers concealed in a ditch and routed them.

Corporal, Company M, 107th Infantry, 27th Division. He crossed an area exposed to heavy fire to deliver a message, and while in the act of delivering his message his left leg was torn off by a shell. He refused

First sergeant, 20th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Killed in action at Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he gave the supreme proof of that extraordinary heroism which will serve as an example to hitherto untried troops.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to friend, Mrs. Rosie Brown.

Sergeant, Company B, 108th Machine Gun Battalion, 28th Division.

The advance of his platoon having been halted by a wire entanglement, Sergeant Grauer advanced alone about 50 yards in advance of his platoon, under enemy fire, and located a gap in the enemy wire. He then signaled to his platoon which advanced. He was mortally wounded in the performance of this act, but his gallant deed enabled the others to continue the attack. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Charles E. Grauer.

Captain, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.

During the St. Mihiel offensive Captain Grave was leading an assault wave which was checked by a dense machine-gun fire. In order to locate the exact position of the enemy strongholds he mounted the parapet, thus drawing a a burst of machine-gun fire, which enabled his Stokes mortars to open fire. He then led a flanking group to the position, while his assault wave went forward and captured 34 prisoners and a machine gun, rifles, and a store of ammunition, the first prisoners to be taken during the drive.

Sergeant, first class, 20th Aero Squadron, Air Service. Volunteering to act as observer and aerial gunner because of the shortage of officer observers, he started on 17 bombing missions, successfully reaching his objective on 14 of these expeditions, shooting down 2 enemy aircraft. On 2 occasions, while flying in the rear of his formation, he drove off superior numbers of German machines.

Corporal, Company A, 1st Gas Regiment.

After other means of communication had failed, he voluntarily carried messages from the regimental post of command to advance positions through several enemy barrages of gas and high-explosive shells. He continued on duty, even after being wounded, until he was exhausted.

Major, 16th Infantry, 1st Division. Having located an enemy machine gun in front of his position, Major (then captain) Graves, with 3 men, voluntarily crawled out to the position of the machine gun, in full view and within 100 yards of the enemy lines, shot the gunner, killed the rest of the crew with grenades, and returned with his party without a casualty.

Major, Infantry, Assistant Chief of Staff, American Expeditionary Forces, Siberia.) For extraordinary heroism in action at Vladivostok, Siberia, Nov. 18, 1919. In answer to a call to save noncombatants entrapped in the railroad station at Vladivostok, Siberia, Major Graves fearlessly entered a zone swept by intense machine-gun and artillery fire of Russian Government and insurgent forces, entered the station, and assisted in locating 6 noncombatants. He escorted them through the attacking troops to a place of safety. Oak-leaf cluster. (Major, Infantry, Forces, Siberia.)

First sergeant, Company A, 102d Machine Gun Battalion, 26th Division.
When all of his officers had been wounded, he took command of the company and led it throughout the attack, under terrific fire from all arms, showing high qualities of leadership and personal bravery.

First lieutenant, 7th Engineers, 5th Division.

Although wounded, he personally supervised the construction of a bridge undersevere artillery and direct machine-gun fire, thereby making it possible for the Infantry and Artillery to advance to more advantageous positions.

Private, Company M, 168th Infantry, 42d Division.
He distinguished himself northeast of Chateau-Thierry, France, on July 28, 1918, when, with 4 other men, he raided an enemy machine-gun nest held by 12 Germans. As a result of their daring and presence of mind, 1 of the enemy was killed, the other 11 captured, and their 4 machine guns turned upon the retreating foe.

First lieutenant, 28th Infantry, 1st Division. He commanded a combat patrol which penetrated 2 kilometers into the enemy lines, and although twice attacked he maintained his position for 36 hours without supplies before returning to our lines with valuable information. The leadership and initiative displayed by Lieutenant Graysou were vital factors in the successful performance of this important mission.

Sergeant, Battery E, 12th Field Artillery, 2d Division.
Sergeant Green continued the service of his piece under a galling enfilleding fire. In his fortitude and devotion to duty, he set a high example to the men of his section until he and his entire crew were casualties. He was killed while serving his piece.

Second lieutenant, 167th Infantry, 42d Division. He set an example of heroism and devotion to duty at Coix Rouge Farm, when he continued to lead his platoon through heavy fire for five days after being wounded.

Private, Company D, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.

Although stunned and bruised by a shell which burst in his trench, he went to the aid of a comrade outside of the trench and brought him to safety. This was in full view of the enemy and under heavy shelling.

Private, Company D, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
During the German artillery bombardment of July 15 he carried messages between company and battalion headquarters, and, although wounded in the arm, he refused evacuation until relieved two days later.

Private, Company A, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
He voluntarily crossed an area swept by heavy machine-gun and artillery fire to carry water to distressed members of his platoon. He was killed in the performance of this self-assigned task.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Frank Green.

Captain, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.

After 2 platoons under his command had been practically wiped out, he continued forward to his objective with 2 enlisted men and remained throughout the night under heavy fire in hope of keeping the ground gained until reinforcements came up.

Corporal, Company D, 339th Infantry, 85th Division (detachment in North Russia).

Hussal.

He led an attack against snipers concealed in houses on the edge of the village.

In order to reach these buildings he was forced to cross an open space of 200 yards, in clear view of the enemy. After reaching the buildings and locating the snipers he alone charged the building in which the snipers were located and captured 14 prisoners.

Sergeant, Company M, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.
He unhesitatingly and with great coolness and courage went forward under a heavy enemy barrage to destroy wire entanglements and continued this hazardous work until killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Green.

Corporal, Company B, 358th Infantry, 90th Division.

While officers were holding a conference in a dugout on our outpost line, a German patrol came across a small footbridge directly to the entrance of the dugout and threw a grenade inside. Corporal Green, without any thought of personal danger, in order to save his officers from injury, stood on the grenade and then shot two of the retreating patrol.

Private, Company H, 353d Infantry, 89th Division. Private Greene displayed conspicuous bravery in twice carrying important mes-sages across an area under heavy shell and machine-gun fire from the front and flanks.

First sergeant, Company H, 107th Infantry, 27th Division. When his commanding officer was severely wounded and evacuated, he took command of the company and led it into effective combat. He continued to lead the company forward through a terrific fire of artillery and machine guns for more than a mile after being severely wounded, and refused to be evacuated until he had received a second wound, which made it impossible for him to continue farther.

Sergeant, Company C, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
Sergeant Greene left the shelter of a trench and went forward some 35 yards and assisted a wounded soldier to shelter. This act was performed shortly after daybreak at a time when the location of the wounded man and the trench were being swept by hostile fire.

Corporal, Company F, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.

While in charge of an outpost he was attacked by a patrol of 12 Germans and held his ground single-handed after the other members of the outpost were either killed or wounded. He inflicted heavy casualties on the enemy patrol, repulsing it, and then held his post until relief came.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Charles F. Greene.

Second lieutenant, 6th Field Artillery, 1st Division.
Attacked in a dugout by a large party of Germans, he was wounded by the explosion of an enemy hand grenade. He refused to surrender when ordered to do so, but instead fought vigorously until he had wounded or driven away all of the attacking party.

Although wounded, he continued to advance with his organization until its objective was reached. He showed qualities of leadership by organizing all the men he could find and assuming command until he was relieved by officers and ordered to have his wound dressed.

Lieutenant colonel, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.

During a terrific enemy shelling on two of his battalions, and after both his battalion commanders had been wounded, Colonel Greenway personally directed the activities and greatly encouraged his forces by his presence.

Leading them in attack, he demonstrated the utmost valor at the most critical moments, and he was the first of his command to enter the German trench which marked the objective of the day's attack.

Sergeant, Company K, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.

He personally led a patrol of 4 raen against a machine gun which was holding up the advance, captured the gun and 9 prisoners. He inspired his men to greater effort by his excellent example, under heavy machine-gun fire, and was killed while reorganizing his platoon after a counterstack.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Leah Greenwood.

Major, 109th Infantry, 28th Division. During an attack on Hill 200 in which his battalion participated, the French and American forces were repulsed with heavy losses owing to terrific machine-gun and artillery fire. Leaving the protection afforded by the trenehes and mounting the parapet thereof, with utter disregard for his own safety and in full view of the enemy, he exhorted his men to again attack, his indifference to the intense enemy machine-gun fire to which he was subjected raising the morale of his men to so high a pitch as to enable them to renew the assault with great enemy and determined the safety of the safety with great courage and determination, driving the enemy from their strongly held positions.

First lieutenant, 3d Observation Group, Air Service.

On the morning of Nov. 1, 1918, during the progress of an important attack, Lieutenant Greist volunteered on a mission to fly through a heavy fog in order Inductional Creak volumered on a mission to by through a heavy log in order to locate the then advanced infantry of the attack. In accomplishing this mission it was necessary to fly at a very low altitude and through the American barrage which was being fired during the flight. He penetrated several kilometers into the enemy's lines, being subjected to heavy machine-gun fire from the ground, which struck his plane many times, obtained information of the disposition of the enemy artillery, infantry, and our own front line. He returned through the fire with the first authentic information to reach the division commander.

Sergeant, Company G, 39th Infantry, 4th Division.

After his patrol had been twice seattered by machine-gun fire, he continued his reconnaissance, accompanied by only one other soldier, and secured the information for which he had been sent. Upon rejoining his company he was placed in command of his plateon, whose commander had been wounded, and succeeded in reorganizing it under heavy shell fire.

Captain, 213th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

while leading a patrol of 3 machines, Captain Grey observed a formation of our bombing planes hard pressed by 12 of the enemy. He attacked the leading enemy machine without hesitation, thereby attracting the enemy's fire and allowing the bombing machines to escape undamaged.

Corporal, Company D, 165th Infantry, 42d Division. When his patrol had been caught under a severe cross fire by machine guns and most of the members killed or wounded, and the survivors withdrew to cover, it was discovered that a wounded man had been left at the farthest point to which the patrol had advanced, Corporal Gribbon volunteered to rescue him. Itunning a hundred yards over open country, swept by withering machine-gun fire, he reached the severely wounded member of his patrol and half dragged half earried his helpless comrade back with him to safety.

Private, Company C, 16th Infantry, 1st Division. Private Grider carried important messages through heavy shell and machinegun fire and fought his way through territory occupied by the enemy.

Second lieutenant, 109th Infantry, 28th Division.

Captain, 364th Infantry, 91st Division.

His company having suddenly become trapped in the smoke and fog under heavy enemy artillery fire, Captain Griffin displayed notable coolness in getneavy enemy artillery lire, Captain Grillin displayed notable coolness in get-ting his men to cover in a trench near by, being the last to take shelter, though he was knocked down by bursting shells in so doing. As soon as the fire abated, he quickly redisposed his men and led them toward the enemy. On the next afternoon, during the attack on Epinonville, he led 11 soldiers in a successful charge on an enemy machine-gun nest. Later he personally assisted in carrying in wounded men of his company under heavy machine-gun fire. On the afternoon of Sept. 29 this officer was severely wounded while on a patrol, but he continued on under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire and successfully accomplished his mission.

Corporal, 45th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Killed in action at Chateau-Thierry, France, June 6, 1918, he gave the supreme proof of that extraordinary heroism which will serve as an example to hitherto untried troops.

He displayed extraordinary heroism and devotion to duty in going to the assistance of a wounded man lying in the open and administering first aid under heavy fire. He was killed while engaged in this courageous service. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Andrew W. Griffith.

Private, Company G, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

He was delivering a message to the front line when he encountered an enemy machine gun firing on our front-line troops from the rear. He crawled to the emplacement and silenced the fire from the gun by killing both gunners.

Captain, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

Captain, 308th Iniantry, 7th Division.

While suffering from the effects of gas, Captain Griffiths led a liaison patrol to the flanking battalion across an open slope and under direct enemy observation, exposed during the whole journey to terrific artillery and machinegun fire. He remained on duty as battalion adjutant, after all other officers had been evacuated because of the effects of gas, although he had been rendered temporarily speechless and blind by a severe gassing.

Second lieutenant, 102d Infantry, 26th Division. During a violent enemy bombardment he advanced with his detachment under intense machine-gun fire, wiped out a machine-gun nest, and captured the gun, which had been harassing the right of our line. He displayed exceptional bravery and resourcefulness throughout the entire engagement.

Private, Company D, 103d Infantry, 26th Division. He, with Sergt. John P. Diggins, climbed out of a trench in the face of severe shrapnel and machine-gun fire, proceeded 150 yards across an open space to the aid of a wounded officer and dressed his wounds.

Sergeant, Company M, 137th Infantry, 35th Division.

Although wounded in the foot, while still in the departure trench, he went forward in the attack with his company. Later he led two platoons to the attack against superior numbers and in the face of withering fire. Wounded a second time, he refused to be evacuated until the regiment was relieved.

Corporal, Company L, 359th Infantry, 90th Division.
When the advance of his company was halted by an impassable barbed-wire entanglement, he voluntarily jumped out of a trench in the face of heavy machine-gun fire and cut sufficient paths through the wire to enable the company to continue its advance. Private, Company L, 16th Infantry, 1st Division. He went forward under intense machine-gun and artillery fire and assisted in the removal of a wounded soldier over a distance of 1 kilometer.

Gunnery sergeant, 83d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

In the Bois-de-Belleau, France, on June 6, 1918, while out with a patrol to obtain information essential to his commander, he was attacked by a German patrol of superior numbers. With six men he attacked the enemy, inflicted heavy losses upon them, and drove them back into the German lines.

First lieutenant, 27th Infantry, U. S. Army. While leading a combat patrol he was fired on by an unknown force of the enemy. he left his patrol, after giving them orders to fire on the enemy, and advanced through a fire-swept zone to an advantageous position on a hill from which he assisted greatly in forcing the retirement of the enemy.

Private, Company D, 372d Infantry, 93d Division. Although he had been badly gassed, he kept his machine gun in action until he fell beside his gun.

Sergeant, Company D, 11th Machine Gun Battalion, 4th Division.
He, with two officers, using captured German Maxim guns, pushed forward to a heavily shelled area, from which the other troops had withdrawn, and by their accurate and effective fire kept groups of the enemy from occupying advantageous positions. When given permission to withdraw he declined to do so, but maintained fire superiority all afternoon until it became too dark to see. His conspicuous gallantry furnished an inspiration to the other members of the command.

Sergeant, Company L, 325th Infantry, 82d Division. He led a patrol against a machine-gun nest which was causing many casualties in his company. He then worked his way to the rear of another machinegun position, charged it, capturing three prisoners, two guns, and killing six of the enemy.

Captain, 4th Engineers, 4th Division.

After reconnoitering a sector of the River Vesle in advance of the front lines of the infantry for the purpose of selecting a site for a footbridge, he went with a small party of engineers through an enemy barrage from 77-millimeter and 1-pounder guns and assisted in directing the construction work. As soon as the operations were discovered, machine-gun fire was opened up on the party, but they continued at work, removing the German wire entanglements and successfully completing a bridge which was of great value in subsequent operations. operations.

his company's entrance therein. He successfully accomplished his mission through the severest barrage and returned with the necessary information for the entrance.

Second lieutenant, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.

Leading his platoon against an enemy machine-gun nest which was inflicting severe casualties on his battalion, he continued to advance alone in the face of the annihilating machine-gun fire after 14 of his men were killed about him. Before reaching his objective he was killed by machine-gun fire from his right flank.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Arvid M. Gulbrandsen.

Sergeant, S2d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Exposing himself to enemy fire, he advanced ahead of his platoon into a ravine and captured, single handed, a German officer and 4 men.

Private, first class, Company E, 310th Infantry, 78th Division.
Private Gumbs, while acting as battalion runner, repeatedly crossed areas subjected to heavy shell and machine-gun fire, carrying messages to and from flank companies. His work, performed with unlesstating devotion to duty, materially contributed to the successful advance of his battalion.

placing the fire under control. Through his coolness and courage the destruction of a large quantity of near-by ammunition was avoided.

Sergeant, 47th Company, 3d Battalion, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. During an advance by his company he directed a charge on an enemy machinegun emplacement, destroying 4 guns and taking 28 prisoners. Later in the attack he alone charged a machine-gun nest, killing 1 gunner, wounding another, and causing the remaining 3 to surrender.

Sergeant, Company E, 353d Infantry, 89th Division.

When his battalion encountered heavy machine-gun fire which stopped its advance, Sergeant Guthrie quickly organized a group of 10 or 12 men from different companies and led them, with exceptional dash and courage, in an attack on the enemy gun. Skillfully picking out a protected route he succeeded in flanking the nest and annihilating the crew.

First lieutenant, 13th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

He was a member of an offensive patrol of 4 planes which was attacked far behind the enemy's lines by 6 German machines. Sergeant Guy displayed exceptional courage in attacking single handed a machine-gun emplacement, capturing the gun and taking as prisoners 3 machine gunners.

Private, Company I, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.

Although severely wounded by shellfire, he remained on duty as machine-gun ammunition carrier throughout the day, refusing to be evacuated. His example of courage inspired those serving near him.

First lieutenant, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

During the attack on Revillon Lieutenant Haas voluntarily left his shelter and went across an open slope in full observation of the enemy and under heavy machine-gun fire to the aid of a wounded soldier, bringing him back to our lines for first-aid treatment.

Corporal, Company I, 316th Infantry, 79th Division.
While performing the duties of supply sergeant Corporal Habecker succeeded in getting food to his company, which was holding the outpost line. He led carrying parties through heavy shellfire, bringing hot coffee and bread to the men. On one occasion he made the journey unaided, taking with him a large quantity of bread.

Private, Company A, 110th Infantry, 28th Division.

He overheard a lieutenant report to the battalion commander the location of an enemy machine-gun nest which was causing beavy casualties among our troops. Due to heavy shelling, delay in the bringing up of a 1-pounder crew was serious, and Private Hacker, realizing the need for immediately silencing the enemy machine guns, acting on his own initiative, advanced alone over a fire-swept area for about 500 yards, attacked and captured the enemy crews of 6 men and 2 machine guns, and brought them back to cur lines.

First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 106th Infantry, 27th Division. Under observation of the enemy and with complete disregard for his own safety he ran and crawled 200 yards to a shell hole where 18 of his men had been killed or wounded by shellfire. Dressing the wounds of 12 of the surviving men, he carried each of them 100 yards to a place of safety under intense enemy machine-gun and artillery fire; from this point they were evacuated by members of a sanitary detachment. Two of the wounded men were killed by enemy fire while being carried in the arms of this officer. The undaunted bravery of Lieutenant Hadley was an inspiration to every member of his organization.

Corporal, Company F, 145th Infantry, 37th Division. He was in command of a small advance post which was successfully held by 3 men and himself against a raid by 80 of the enemy. Two of his party were killed, but the staunch defense of the others drove off the raiders. He personally killed 3 of the enemy in hand-to-hand fighting.

Private, Company C, 6th Machine Gun Battalion, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

When our advanced Infantry was forced to withdraw, Private Haefliger's machine-gun crew refused to withdraw, but calmly set up their machine gun. The gun was upset by a bursting hand grenade, which also injured Private flaefliger and another member of the squad. Despite their injuries, they immediately reset the gun and opened fire on the advancing Germans when 20 feet distant, causing the Germans to break and retreat in disorder.

First lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

For extraordinary heroism in action at Bois-de-Belleau, France, June 6, 1918, when he rescued a platoon sergeant of his regiment from death or capture. In the face of heavy machine-gun and rifle fire he rushed across an open space of 200 yards under full view of the intrenched enemy forces and within 25 yards of his lines placed the wounded sergeant upon his back and returned under a withering fire to his own lines. His splendid act of devotion to duty and his utter disregard for his own safety inspired the men of his regiment with renewed courage and determination.

Private, Company K, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
When his squad was held up by fire from a sniper's post he advanced alone against it across an open space and drove the others off, allowing a renewal of the advance. Later he braved heavy shellfire to go to the aid of wounded soldiers, dressing their wounds and assisting them back to the lines.

Private, first class, Company M, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
This soldier carried frequent messages through barrage fire, and later brought in wounded and carried ammunition to the front line. On July 26, near Jaulgonne, this man also carried messages through the most violent shellfire. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Frank Hageman.

Private, Company M, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.
During a period that his company was held up by hazardous enemy fire Private Hagemeyer acted as stretcher bearer, and even though wounded and ordered to the rear, he continued in the work of removing the wounded. He remained at his task through the violent fire until he was wounded five times and forced to retire from loss of blood.

Private, first class, Company A, 354th Infantry, 89th Division. Seeing his platoon held up by murderous machine-gun fire, Private Hagerman advanced over an open area in the face of fierce machine-gun fire to a point within 150 yards of the enemy, from where he destroyed the machine-gun nest with rifle grenades.

Second lieutenant, 7th Field Artillery, 1st Division. He unhesitatingly went into heavy shellfire to supervise the repair of telephone lines and to act as runner when the further maintenance of the wires became an impossibility.

Corporal, Machine Gun Company, 354th Infautry, 89th Division.
Corporal Hahn displayed exceptional bravery and initiative in leading his machine-gun squad through heavy fire ahead of the Infantry front line to a point only 30 yards from 6 enemy machine guns which defended a hill. Despite the intense grenade and machine-gun fire which was directed at him he maintained such effective fire that the hostile guns were put out of action and the Infantry advance therefore year regression. and the Infantry advance thereupon resumed.

Private, first class, medical detachment, 354th Infantry, 89th Division. Braving the deadly machine-gun and artillery fire, he worked unceasingly, and with no regard for his personal safety in administering to wounded men and assisting them to places of safety. He constantly went forward into the open under machine-gun fire to aid fallen comrades, and his work was the means of saving many lives.

Second lieutenant, 142d Infantry, 36th Division. Lieutenant Haley was severely wounded in the head while leading his platoon forward, but he continued in the advance, directing the cutting of wire entanglements under heavy fire. Shortly afterwards he received another wound in the face, but he again refused to go to the rear, remaining with his platoon, encouraging his men, and maintaining organization until he became unconscious.

Sergeant, Company B, 150th Machine Gun Battalion, 42d Division. He displayed courage, coolness, and leadership throughout the attack on the enemy positions north of the River Ourcq. The machine-gun crew which he was directing shot 7 enemy snipers from their posts. He was killed while reconnoitering in advance of our lines for an advantageous position for his guns Major, adjutant, 3d Infantry Brigade, 2d Division.

At a critical time in the battle, when information was difficult to obtain, Major Hall, brigade adjutant, volunteered to report on the fighting in Vierzy, which was then in the hands of the enemy. Accompanying a group of French tanks, he entered the town under intense fire, and during the advance went forward through machine-gun fire and carried to safety a wounded man. He assisted materially in maintaining organization among the troops and established a first-aid station at which many wounded were cared for, returning later to brigade headquarters with valuable information.

Private, Company E, 26th Infantry, 1st Division. He refused to go to the rear when wounded near Soissons, France, July 19, 1918, continued to fire his automatic rifle with effectiveness, and when finally exhausted directed another man in the use of the rifle and attempted to act us ammunition carrier.

Private, Machine Gnn Company, 305th Infantry, 77th Division.

After having been ordered to a place of safety he left his shelter and returned to a trench which was being severely shelled, rescued and brought back 2 wounded comrades. He was killed in action 3 days later.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Dorothy G. Hall.

Private, Company A, 59th Infantry, 4th Division. When his company was in a perilous position he volunteered and carried a message to battalion headquarters, a distance of 1,000 yards, under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire. On his return journey he was killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. May B. Amberg.

Private, Company L, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.

When the carrier of a Lewis gun crew was killed, he took his place, and the ammunition becoming exhausted, volunteered to go for a new supply under heavy fire. Wounded while on this mission, he opened fire on the enemy with his rifle, engaging a hostile patrol until he was mortally wounded by a second bulls! second bullet.

Captain, 103d Aero Squadron, Air Service. On Mar. 27, 1918, while leading a patrol of 3, he attacked a group of 5 enemy fighters and 3 enemy 2-seaters, himself destroying 1 and forcing down 2 others in a fight lasting more than 20 minutes.

First lieutenant, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

Disregarding his extremely weak condition, he insisted on going into attack with his company. Recent illness made it nearly impossible for him to stand, still he went to all parts of the line during an enemy counter barrage and murderous machine-gun fire, maintaining his platoon formations. By giving his overcoat to a wounded man, he so exposed himself that he died shortly afterwards from the effects.

Corporal, Company M, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
While in charge of two squads of a reconnoitering patrol on an exceptionally hazardous mission in the vicinity of Serieux Farm, he displayed utter fearlessness, leading his men in groups through zones swept by intense machinegun fire, returning three times to guide those left behind. Reaching his objective, he voluntarily entered and moved about within the German lines, returning with important information for the officer in charge of the patrol. When the patrol was surrounded, Corporal Halley, although dangerously situated with his men, held on, refusing to surrender and repulsed two attacks. Later, when attacked by much greater force, he succeeded under cover of semidarkness in withdrawing under heavy fire and joined his company. His bravery, coolness, and devotion to duty were a constant inspiration to his men. his men.

Private, Company I, 28th Infantry, 1st Division. He acted as liaison agent during the fight of May 28-30, 1918, at Cantigny, France, with courageous disregard of his own safety.

Lieutenant Hambleton, accompanied by Lieutenant Taylor, while answering an alert to Lironville, France, encountered five enemy airplanes in the vicinity of St. Mihiel. As the American airplanes approached the enemy turned away. Lieutenant Hambleton and Lieutenant Taylor followed, and at Pont-a-Mousson again overtook the enemy, one airplane flying at 1,500 meters, two at 2,000 meters, and the remaining two airplanes at 2,500 meters. Lieutenant Hambleton attacked the lowest airplane, firing 20 rounds and driving it from the formation. An enemy bullet shot the cross section wires from his airplane, the splinters from the hullet cutting his cheek and right shoulder. Notwithstanding his wounds and the disabled condition of his airplane, he continued to fight until the enemy was driven to its own lines.

Lieutenant Hambleton was awarded an oak-leaf cluster for the following act of heroism: For extraordinary heroism near Gironville, France, June 6, 1918. After becoming separated from his patrol, on account of misty weather, Lieutenant Hambleton was flying in the region of Gironville when he encountered two enemy biplane machines. He engaged them in a sharp combat despite the fact that he was being subjected to the concentrated fire of both biplanes. He pulled away and was maneuvering for a better position when the biplanes started into Germany and he promptly chased them across the lines, thereby preventing them from performing a photographic mission. On the same date in the region of Grissolles, while leading a patrol. Lieutenant Hambleton encountered a formation of five enemy pura patrol, Lieutenant Hambleton encountered a formation of five enemy pursuit airplanes. He gallantly led the attack, and after a short and decisive suit arplanes. He gallantly led the attack, and after a short and decisive fight with one enemy airplane, during which time he was subjected to the concentrated fire of the other enemy airplanes, he drove it to the ground, where it crashed. Still undaunted, he returned and, without hesitation or fear, repeatedly attacked the remainder of the enemy formation until he had forced it to retire in disorder. The rare courage and superb devotion to duty displayed by Lieutenant Hambleton greatly inspired the members of his squadron.

Major, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.

Major Hanna displayed extreme courage on Nov. 6 by making a daring reconnaissance of the town of Pouilly, near Stenay. This town was held in strength by the enemy, with evident indication of determination to prevent a crossing of the River Meuse at this point. He remained in this town over two hours, returning with information of great value. On the night of Nov. 10-11 he was in command of the second battalion of the 356th Infantry, and while waiting to cross the River Meuse Major Hanna's battalion was subject to terrific shell fire. During this period he walked up and down the line encouraging and steadying his men. Major Hanna was killed at the head of his command. Posthumously awarded. Although severely wounded in the leg by machine-gun fire, he refused to go to the rear, bandaged his own wound, and advanced with his platoon until its final objective was reached.

First sergeant, Company K, 364th Infantry, 91st Division. Responding to a call for volunteers, he crossed an open space a distance of about 300 yards under terrific hostile fire of machine guns and artillery to the position held by his machine-gun company to inform them of the location of enemy machine-gun nests and snipers, who had escaped detection. The enflading fire of the enemy threatened to wipe out his company, but the success of his mission enabled our guns to silence the fire c the enemy. Hardie, William C. (549510)

Sergeant, Company A, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
During the preparations for the German offensive of July 15, 1918, and through the intense artillery bombardment connected therewith, Sergeant Hardie showed utter disregard of personal danger by voluntarily rescuing wounded comrades from exposed positions.

Private, 18th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. During the offensive operations at Blane Mont Ridge he volunteered and went into no man's land, under intense machine-gun fire, and brought in a wounded man.

Private, Company L, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
During four days of operations and under unusually adverse conditions, Private Hardin, acting as company runner, repeatedly carried messages from company headquarters to the front line, over open ground, subjected to s bell and direct machine-gun fire. With practically no food or sleep, and showing absolute disregard for personal safety, he successfully performed each mission, aiding materially in the maintenance of hiaison and the success of the Sergeant, Company L, 142d Infautry, 36th Division. He was severely wounded in the right shoulder early in the action, but although bleeding profusely, he refused to go to the rear until the enemy's position had been captured and the line consolidated.

Second lieutenant, 120th Field Artillery, 32d Division.
On duty as artillery information officer, Lieutenant Harding displayed the utmost courage, fortitude, and devotion to duty in maintaining liaison between the Infantry and Artillery, going repeatedly to the front line and carrying messages for both Infantry and Artillery commanders. In seeking the location of an Infantry company, under heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, he searched the woods on the Cote Dame Marie, as far as the enemy's wire, where he was killed by machine-gun fire.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. J. S. Harding.

Private, first class, Company C, 105th Field Signal Battalion, 30th Division. Being a member of a detail to establish communication with the front line, Private Hardison was caught in an enemy barrage, during which his detail suffered many casualties. Although badly gassed, he continued to work for the entire day, always exposed to heavy artillery fire, after which he assisted in the removal of the wounded.

Private, Company A, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.

Although painfully wounded during the battle of the Marne, he continued on duty with his platoon and was active in bringing wounded men to the safety of our lines.

Corporal, Machine Gun Company, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
Corporal Hardy remained with his gun after all the other members of his gun crew were killed or wounded. He continued to fire until his ammunition was exhausted, then removed the firing mechanism and returned to our lines. fighting his way with his pistol.

Private, first class, Company H, 38th Infantry, 3d Division. During the intense enemy artillery shelling in preparation for the German offensive of July 15, 1918, he voluntarily made three attempts to bring in a wounded contrade who was exposed to encmy fire before he finally succeeded in getting him to safety.

First lieutenant, 309th Machine Gun Battalion, 78th Division.

He personally made a reconnaissance of the entire front of the battalion to which he was attached, under heavy machine-gun and shell fire, and returned with very valuable information in the shortest time possible. He returned through an open field, subjected to an enemy fire. This officer later rendered valuable assistance in repelling a counterattack by his coolness and intelligent direction of the company.

Private, 15th Ambulance Company, 2d Sanitary Train attached to 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
On June 6, 1918, in the vicinity of Chateau-Thierry, with a corporal, he went out into an open field under heavy shell and machine-gun fire and succeeded in bandaging and carrying back to our lines a wounded comrade.

Private, Machine Gun Company, 107th Infantry, 27th Division. After an advance of more than 2,000 yards with the Infantry, Private Harlin crawled through a barbed-wire entanglement and remained the entire night under machine-gun fire within a few yards of enemy position in order to protect his comrades from a surprise attack.

He repaired five breaks in a 50-yard stretch of wire, and when the same small section was again broken in four places he carried a message through heavy shelling to the regimental post of command.

First lieutenant, 26th Inlantry, 1st Division.

He refused to be evacuated when wounded near Soissons, France, July 19, 1918, but continued forward with his command in a third successful advance until wounded seriously a second time.

Private, Company C, 102d Infantry, 26th Division. He carried messages across an area swept by violent machine-gun and artillery fire, showing remarkable bravery and devotion to duty on several occasions when the situation was critical and the messages were of the utmost importance.

Sergeant, Company B, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
This soldier showed exceptional courage, initiative, and devotion to duty.
After all the company officers were either killed or wounded, he assumed command, and with absolute disregard of his own salety did reorganize, under intense shell and machine-gun fire, the scattering units of the company and fearlessly led them to their objective. By this action many casualties were avoided, and by his personal example of coolness and courage the men were so encouraged and stimulated that they accomplished their difficult task.

Sergeant, Company K, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
Upon discovering an enemy machine-gun nest beyond the objective, on his own initiative he crawled out with 2 mcn, and though subjected to heavy fire flanked the position, captured the machine gnn and 31 prisoners, 1 of them an officer, killing 2 of the enemy who tried to escape.

Private, Company K, 11th Infantry, 5th Division.
While carrying a message to another battalion in the line, Private Harrell was wounded by a machine-gun bullet at the same time his companion was killed.
He courageously delivered his message, despite the wound, and received an answer, which he delivered to his company and battalion commanders before being evacuated.

Lieutenant colonel, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

Colonel Harrell showed extraordinary coolness under fire in the battle of the Argonne. When one portion of his battalion was held up by machine-gun fire he went forward to the most advanced elements, reorganized them, and carried the objective, but was severely wounded while in the execution of his mission.

Second licutenant, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
While in command of his platoon in the Humbert Plantation on May 27, 1918, while in command of insplation in the full interfer relation on May 27, 1918, he was viciously attacked by the enemy in greatly superior numbers. He led his men with determination and great courage, and himself stopped their advance in a side trench. He was mortally wounded but continued to fight on, calling upon and encouraging his men and participating with them in driving the enemy off. Died May 31, 1918.

Sergeant, first class, 2d Engineers, 2d Division.

Assisting in the removal of the wounded, Sergeant Harriman drove an ambulance throughout the entire night, continuing until several hits by the enemy completely disabled his machine. The next morning he led his men into the trenches through an intense shelling, and remained in command for 12 hours after being wounded.

Sergeant, Company C, 109th Infantry, 28th Division.
Sergeant Harrington, though wounded and about to be carried to the rear, serigeant Harrington, though wounded and about to be carried to the rear, seeing two comrades who were apparently more severely wounded than himself, ordered the litter bearers to carry the other men first. Before the litter bearers returned, Sergeant Harrington was killed by a machine-gun bullet. His bravery, sacrifice, and qualities of leadership were an inspiration to the members of his command.

Captain, 309th Machine Gun Battalien, 78th Division.

On Oct. 25, 1918, Captain Hart volunteered to lead his company into a particularly dangerous sector on the ridge north of Grand Pre, offering their use practically as infantry. His act was of inestimable value in strengthening the morale of the Infantry battalion which had suffered very heavy casualties and had no prospect of relief. On the morning of Oct. 26 during a counterattack he not only personally directed the location of his machine guns in the outpost line, but by his splendid example of fearlessness he rallied and commanded the Infantry when no other officer was available, and was an inspiration both to the infantrymen and machine gunners in holding the ridge. He fought valiantly until very seriously wounded by enemy machinegun fire.

First lieutenant, 6th Machine Gun Battalion, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Acting as company commander, Lieutenant Hart advanced with the first wave of Infantry to locate favorable positions for his guns. He discovered an enemy machine gun which he, alone, attacked, and although severely wounded, succeeded in capturing the gun and taking the crew prisoners.

On Sept. 13 he unhesitatingly went to the assistance of three allied planes which were being attacked by a large patrol of the enemy, and by his steady fire drove off the enemy patrol and enabled the three allied planes to return.

Despite heavy artillery and machine-gun fire that forced the patrol to scatter and separated him from the lieutenant in charge, he continued the work on his own initiative, and, acting entirely without orders, started his detail on the actual construction of rafts for the pontoon bridges. His courage, ability as a leader, and his inflexible determination made the reconneissance a complete success. made the reconnaissance a complete success.

First sergeant, Company I, 314th Infantry, 79th Division. Sergeant Hartmann advanced alone and silenced a machine-gun nest which was holding up an entire platoon.

Major, 27th Aero Squadron, 1st Pursuit Group, Air Service.

Major, 2701 Acto Squadnon, 18st I asta Group, All Service.

He voluntarily accompanied a reconnaissance patrol. Realizing the importance of the mission, he took command, and, although 5 enemy planes repeatedly made attempts to drive them back, he continued into enemy territory, returning later to our lines with important information. The cool judgment and determination displayed by Major Hartney furnished an inspiration to all members of his command.

ergeant, Company B, 354th Infantry, 89th Division.

Sergeant, Company B, 5340 Infantry, 38th Division. While leading his combat group forward he encountered a machine-gun stronghold, which opened fire on his force from three sides. He charged the guns to the front, but he was killed on reaching the line. His valerous act, however, enabled his men to break the line and take the flanking guns, thereby saving many casualties in his platoon. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Anna E. Hartung.

Private, Section No. 633, Ambulance Service.
From Mar. 20 to 23, 1918, he repeatedly drove his ambulance over a road east of Reims, France, that was under bombardment of gas and explosive shells. Upon one occasion, while cranking his car, he was knocked several yards by the explosion of a shell, yet he continued his work. Another day his car was hit by a shell and badly damaged, and he himself was severely wounded in the head and both legs. In spite of his wounds he carried a wounded man who was in the ambulance to a place of safety, made him comfortable, and then crawled to a dressing station for assistance.

Private, Troop A, 6th Cavalry, U. S. Army.

For extraordinary heroism in action against hostile Moros on Patian Island, P. I., July 4, 1909. Private Harty, with other men, entered a cave occupied by a desperate enemy, and in the face of a heavy fire, with utter disregard for his personal safety, aided in forcing the outlaws to abandon their stronghold, which resulted in their destruction by our forces.

Captain, 18th Field Artillery, 3d Division.

During the bombardment preceding the enemy attack across the Marne the postition of Battery A, 18th Field Artillery, was subjected to heavy artillery fire for a period of 4 hours. All communications were destroyed and the ammunition dump destroyed by hostile fire. Throughout the enemy bombardment, Captain Harvey kept his battery in action, exposing himself to concentrated enemy artillery fire in order to repleinsh his ammunition supply, and delivered an effective fire on the enemy.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Ethel C. Harvey.

First lieutenant, Field Artillery, observer, 12th Aero Squadron, Air Service. He volunteered, with another plane, to protect a photographic plane. In the course of their mission they were attacked by 7 enemy planes (Fokker type). He accepted the combat and kept the enemy engaged while the photographic plane completed its mission. His guns jammed and he himself was seriously wounded. After skillfully clearing his guns, with his plane hadly damaged, he fought off the hostile planes and enabled the photographic plane to return to our lines with valuable information.

Private, Company D, 9th Infantry, 2d Division. While acting as battalion runner, Private Harwood, regardless of personal danmany times volunteered and carried messages under the most intense shell fire, and greatly assisted in maintaining liaison with other units.

Second licutenant, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
Throughout the action from Oct. 23 to 28, he set a splendid example of courage and heroism to his company in action against overwhelming odds. On Oct. 29, upon learning that 4 of his men were in shell holes in front of the line and near the enemy's position and were so badly wounded that they could not return without assistance, he crawled forward and rescued the 4 men, one at a time, bringing them back to our lines through a constant and terrific machine-gun fire.

Wagoner, 33d Ambulanee Company, 4th Sanitary Train, 4th Division. He was on duty with his ambulanee, carrying wounded from a battalion aid station. He left with 4 stretcher cases and went about 2 kilometers south of Gereourt; while ascending a hill his ambulance was struck by a shell, he receiving multiple shell wounds of hands, left thigh, and feet. Although seriously wounded, he bravely remained at his post and continued on with his ambulance along a shell-swept road to the crest of the hill near an aid station, when he turned his ambulance off the road and sought assistance for his wounded his wounded.

Wagoner, Company B, 101st Machine Gun Battalion, 26th Division. He was seriously wounded in the leg while placing injured soldiers in his ambulance. Nevertheless, he insisted on driving the machine to the dressing station and continued the work of evacuating the wounded until exhausted from loss of blood.

Captain, 12th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
While on an artillery surveillance mission, he engaged 4 enemy planes, which were about to attack the American balloon line. He succeeded in diverting them from the balloons, but in the combat his machine gun became jammed. Driving off his nearest adversary by firing a Very pistol at him, he succeeded in clearing the jam, and, returning to the fight, he destroyed one hostile plane and dispersed the remainder of the group.

Corporal Company E, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.

He led his squad in the attack with conspicuous bravery and utter disregard for his own safety. Although wounded three times, he refused to go to the rear for medical attention and remained at his post on the firing line until his company was relieved the following night. Throughout the fight he rendered valuable assistance to his platoon leader, assisted in reorganizing the company offer the steady and in representative for the countrication. after the attack and in preparing the position for the counterattack.

Private, Machine Gun Company, 11th Infantry, 5th Division. Wounded in the leg by shrapnel, Private Hassebrock continued in the advance, carrying his machine gun. Soon afterwards he was knocked down and again wounded in the same leg, but, although he was ordered to a dressing station he succeeded in joining his gun crew at the firing position, where he was wounded severely for the third time.

First lieutanant, 358th Infantry, 90th Division. Although he was severely wounded, he refused to go to a first-aid station, but continued to give great assistance in silencing enemy machine-gun nests.

Sergeant, Company K, 362d Infantry, 91st Division.

Although he was seriously wounded, he remained in command of his platoon until he was relieved next morning, displaying exceptional devotion to duty.

Sergeant, Company E, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
When his company was subjected to deadly machine-gun fire from two hostile machine-gun nests he, upon his own initiative, organized an attacking group and led it in an assault on the nests, putting them out of action and making the further advance of his company possible.

Second lieutenant, 317th Infantry, 80th Division. Seriously wounded in both knees while leading his platoon against German machine-gun nests, Lieutenant Hatch declined to be evacuated, but remained in command of his platoon for 9 hours until it was relieved.

Private, first class, Headquarters Company, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
After being wounded by a shell which buried him in a small hole, he made a trip to battalion headquarters, carrying a message from his platoon, and after returning with an answer assisted in earrying ammunition until the sergeant discovered that he had been wounded and sent him to the aid station.

Major, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.

Personally leading his battalion, which was the assault battalion, in the advance upon Sedan, Major Haubrich exposed himself many times to intense machinegun and heavy artillery fire in order to keep contact with the enemy, greatly encouraging all the members of his command by his gallantry. Later in the day he was wounded, but he continued on duty until two hours later, when he had his wounds dressed at the first-aid station, resuming command immediately afterwards.

Private, Company A, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
Under a heavy gas and shell bombardment he repeatedly volunteered and delivered messages over routes other than his own when the runners assigned to those routes had been killed or wounded.

Private, Company I, 28th Infantry, 1st Division. With the aid of two men be charged and captured a German machine gun.

Private, Company B, 1st Engineers, 1st Division.

Upon his own initiative, Private Haven, with another soldier, displayed notable courage in attacking two machine guns which were hindering the advance. Undaunted by the heavy machine-gun fire, they poured a deadly rifle fire upon the enemy gunners and forced them to flee toward our attacking troops who continued them. who captured them.

Sergeant, Company G, 145th Infantry, 37th Division. He advanced alone under heavy machine-gun fire and killed 2 of the enemy who were delivering effective machine-gun fire on the attacking wave of his company and delaying its progress.

Private, first class, Company F, 167th Infantry, 42d Division. Private, Havie, as company runner, without hesitation or fear of fire from heavy artillery and machine guns, made repeated trips with messages between company and battalion headquarters. On one trip he was attacked by 2 Germans, 1 of whom he killed. Taking the other prisoner, he continued on his mission and turned his prisoner over to the battalion commander after delivering his message.

Sergeant. Company L, 325th Infantry, 82d Division.
When his company was temporarily held up by severe machine-gun fire, Sergeant Hawke led a patrol in an attack on an enemy machine gun, working his way behind the gun and rushing it, killing one of the crew, wounding another, and taking three prisoners.

Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 119th Infantry, 30th Division. As a platoon runner he showed marked personal bravery, repeatedly carrying important messages over shell-swept areas and under heavy machine-gun fire, sometimes for a distance of 2 miles. He remained constantly on duty for 2 days, and when his section leader became separated from his section, took command and led it with success.

First lieutenant, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

Acting as liaison officer during the foreing of the La Selle River, Lieutenant Hawkins was severely wounded by an exploding shell. Undeterred by the weakened condition to which his wound reduced him, he bravely continued on, working untiringly under heavy shell and machine-gun fire for 2 days until the advance of his battal on was checked.

Captain, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

Although suffering intense pain from a gunshot wound in the leg which had not healed, he led the regimental assault battalion, of which he was in command, in the attack on that day. Forging ahead of his lines with his staff in darkness and fog, he suddenly came upon a German detachment to the rear of which were 2 machine guns which immediately opened fire. Despite surprise, courageously exposing himself, he advanced intrepidly on the nest with utter disregard for personal safety, firing his pistol, wounding some of the crew and falling, mortally wounded, when only 10 yards from the pit from which the fire was directed.

Corporal Head volunteered and removed the switchboard, changing the wire connections so that communication would not be interrupted. For five or six minutes he worked under intense shellfire, several shells passing through the building as he worked. He succeeded, however, in reestablishing the line connectious outside the building. Immediately after he left the building it was completely demolished by a shell. ished by a shell.

Sergeant, Company G, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

Although wounded on the third day of the battle in the Argonne Forest, Sergeant Healey continually exposed himself to machine-gun and artillery fire while aiding and cheering his men. He also volunteered his services in an attempt to break through the enemy lines and bring aid to his organization.

Second lieutenant, 8th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division. Second neutenant, 8th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division.

After several runners had been unsuccessful in attempts to carry an important message, Lieutenant Healy volunteered and succeeded in delivering the message through intense shellfire, returning with the reply and aiding three wounded infantrymen en route. Later, with another officer, he went through heavy enemy shell and machine-gun fire and carried to shelter two wounded Frenchmen.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John J. Healy.

First lieutenant, 147th Aero Squadron, Air Service. Becoming separated from his patrol, Lieutenant Healy, flying at an altitude of 600 meters, discovered an enemy plane (type Halberstadt) hiding in the sun 200 meters above him, which he attacked and sent to the ground in a steep dive. He then noticed two other machines (type Fokker) which had been attempting to attack him. He succeeded in outmaneuvering them and finally shot down one of the Fokkers. He returned without a drop of gasoline in his tank.

Captain, 360th Infantry, 90th Division. After all the other officers of his company had been wounded, Captain Heard remained in command, though be had himself been severely wounded and was suffering from illness, courageously leading his men throughout two days and nights of severe lighting.

Corporal, Company C, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.

Anticipating an enemy counterattack, he was ordered to take out a patrol of eight men to scour the woods to the left of his position, drive out the snipers, and establish liaison with the enemy on the left. Fearing that the size of the patrol would attract too much attention, he left the others in the trench, and going out, accomplished the mission alone, returning under heavy machine-gun fire.

Private, Company C, 2d Antiaircraft Machine Gun Battalion, Alr Service. He went through intense shellfire and assisted Second Lieutenant Samuel F. Telfair in carrying a wounded comrade to safety.

Sergeant, Company C, 146th Infantry, 37th Division.

Throughout the five days' offensive he commanded his platoon with rare coolness and was always in the first wave of his company, facing the greatest danger. He personally took charge of a thin line of outposts on the flank and broke up a German counterattack that was forming under the protection of a barrage. On the fourth day of the drive this soldier was severely gassed, but he concealed this fact from his officers until he was exhausted.

Second lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. With the assistance of three sergeants, he started out to destroy the final stand of the enemy in the Bois-de-Belleau, an impregnable position, where enemy guns were concealed by rocks and heavy shrubbery. Armed with only a pistol, he rushed the nest which was offering the most violent resistance and captured 1 officer and 90 men. Each of his men destroyed a nest and captured two of the enemy at each position. After effecting the complete reduction of the last element, he marched his prisoners in under a severe and harassing fire of the retreating enemy.

Private, first class, Company F, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
Private Hedlund, a runner, maintained liaison between his company commander and an isolated combat group. Passing through two German attacking waves under intense fire, he reached the combat group. On the return trip several Germans attempted to take him prisoner. He shot one of them, bayoneted another, and escaped from the others. He made three more trips to the combat group and kept up constant liaison.

Captain, 110th Engineers, 35th Division.
While reconnoitering for mined bridges, he was warned that a certain masonry arch was held under enemy machine-gun fire. He placed his detail under cover, advanced alone under persistent fire, exposing himself continually while removing detonaters from the mines he found, and returned across open ground to his command.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Geraldine Hedrick.

Private, Company C, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.

Private Helfron repeatedly carried messages to front-line platoons over routes exposed to heavy machine gun and artillery fire. Due to his individual efforts communication was maintained during a critical period.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Michael Heffron.

Sergeant, Company C, 353d Infantry, 89th Division. Prior to the attack Sergeant Heffron saved his platoon from exposure to enemy fire by going out of our trench in the face of the enemy machine-gun barrage and cutting a path through our wire. He then made his way back to his men and led them through this opening. Though the enemy machine-gun fire was intense, he carefully organized his platoon and had it in perfect formation when the command was given to advance. His example of coolness and bravery steadied his men and gave them confidence at the start of their first offensive. He was killed by a shell as he was leading his men across the first enemy trenches.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. William Heffron.

First lieutenant, 356th Infantry, 89th Division. On the night of Sept. 23, though wounded in the shoulder at the beginning of the attack on Domnartin Wood, Lieutenant Heiken continued until his mission was successfully accomplished. On the night of Nov. 9, with 8 menhe was the first to cross the Meuse and patrol enemy lines. On the night of Nov. 10, with 20 men, he covered the crossing of his battalion until severely wounded.

Private, Company G, 125th Infantry, 32d Division. Throughout the battle to force passage of the Ourcq River and capture the heights beyond, Private Heikkinen, a stretcher bearer, worked day and night evacuating the wounded under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire. On Aug. 3, under violent shel fire, opposite Mont St. Martin, he made repeated trips between the firing line and the dressing station until wounded.

Sergeant, Company L, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.

During the operations against the Hindenburg line Sergeant Heim displayed great gallantry and leadership in reorganizing and assuming command of his company and leading it into effective combat after all the officers had been killed or wounded.

Second lieutenant, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.
When machine-gun nests were rendering his position untenable, Lieutenant Heimerdinger led a patrol of 12 men into the enemy's lines, reducing the number of nests and returning with 20 prisoners. During his return his patrol was fired upon and 2 of his men wounded. He then took 2 of his men and kept a fire on the enemy until both his wounded and prisoners could be brought in.

Captain, 147th Infantry, 37th Division.
Heeding a call for help from a severely wounded soldier, Captain Heintz immediately left his place of shelter and crawled through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire to the aid of the man and carried him to a place of safety. Oak-leaf chister.

For extraordinary heroism in action near Cierges, France, Sept. 28, 1918. While serving as operations officer of his regiment, with complete disregard for his own safety and under terrific enemy machine-gun, rific, sniper, and artillery fire, Captain Heintz ran and crawled several hundred yards to the post of command of the commander of the assault battalion of his regiment after several runners had been killed or wounded in attempting the same object and delivered orders from the regimental commander which served to prevent a successful enemy attack and enabled the battalions in support and reserve to reorganize their forces for defense of the regiment's position. The daring and soldierly devotion to duty displayed by Captain Heintz greatly inspired the officers and men with whom he served.

Captain, 139th Infantry, 35th Division.

In order to secure important information as to the position of hostile batteries, he passed through the enemy's artillery fire and was twice severely wounded. In spite of his wounds he remained on duty throughout the entire engagement and gave great assistance in the reorganization of advance positions.

arms, he stayed with the gun until he was relieved 12 hours later.

First lieutenant, 114th Infantry, 29 Division.

After having seen several of his men killed or wounded in an attempt to deliver a message through a heavily shelled area, Lieutenant Heinzmann volunteered and carried the dispatch to its objective, then offered to return through the same barrage on any mission required by his battalion commander.

Corporal, Company A, 31st Infantry.

When his platoon was completely surrounded by the enemy he volunteered to carry a message through the enemy's lines to the nearest American troops at Novo-Nezhino, 6 miles away. Corporal Heinzmann succeeded in getting through the enemy's lines, reached the nearest American forces, and returned with reinforcements for his platoon.

Second lieutenant, 327th Battalion, Tank Corps.

With rare coolness, courage, energy, and initiative he led two platoons of tanks against an enemy attack upon the town of Apremont. Two of the tanks being disabled, he continued to advance, causing heavy casualties among the enemy forces. He continued for a considerable distance within the enemy lines and attacked them from the rear, thus rendering highly important help to his own forces. He continued his attack upon the enemy until his own tank was completely disabled. Discovering a wounded sergeant lying exposed to violent enemy machine-gun, rifle, and artillery fire he carried the wounded want a shelter. wounded man to shelter.

Private, headquarters detachment, 10th Field Artillery, 3d Division.
Being on duty as a messenger between battalion headquarters and the battery positions when the roads were under heavy bombardment of gas and highexplosive shells, Private Helikson continued to make trips until his foot was

First lieutenant, 11th Field Artillery, 6th Division. Acting as battalion telephone officer, Lieutenant Helm repeatedly went out himself under heavy fire rather than assign such hazardous missions to members of his detail, personally directing the repair and maintenance of a line which was severed 15 times in two hours within a length of only 1 kilometer.

Captain, 1st Engineers, 1st Division.
Captain Helmick personally organized his company for the attack and directed the consolidation of the captured objective. He established his post of command in the front line, and repeatedly passed up and down the line directing his men under heavy shell fire until severely wounded.

Private, Company M, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
Through heavy machine-gun fire and artillery barrage fire he, with another man, dragged a wounded comrade from within 100 feet of the enemy lines to his own lines, a distance of 150 yards.

First lieutenant, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
During the attack of Hill 272, he courageously led, under a heavy machine-gun fire, a section of his machine-gun platoon to a position from which they could engage a machine-gun nest about 400 yards distant that was causing heavy casualties, and although severely wounded, he nevertheless remained in command and directed the advance which resulted in taking the enemy strong point and relieving an exposed flank from a heavy fire.

After many other runners had been killed or wounded, Private Henry carried several messages from platoon to company headquarters. At this time the enemy had crossed the Marne River, and the route followed by Private Henry was exposed to heavy artillery and machine-gun fire.

Sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 370th Infantry, 93d Division.
While leading his squad under heavy fire, he displayed great bravery and coolness by repairing a damaged gun under direct enemy observation. He proved of valuable assistance to the one remaining officer of his company in assembling the scattered units of his company after they had reached their objective.

Corporal, Company E, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.

In the advance up the hill of Les Jumbles Woods, in the face of a heavy machine gun and artillery barrage, he was wounded in the shoulder, but he nevertheless continued to advance. Being unable to use his rifle, he threw it down, drew his pistol, and led his platoon forward until he received 6 more bullet wounds.

First lieutenant, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.
Lieutenant Henry gallantly led his platoon forward through heavy machinegun fire in an attack on a strongly held enemy position. Due to his initiative and gallantry, 2 enemy machine guns were captured and 25 of the enemy forced to surrender. Later, when wounded, he refused to be evacuated until, through loss of blood, he could go no farther.

Sergeant, Company H, 56th Infantry, 7th Division When the position of his platoon became untenable on account of machine-gun fire from a nest in their front, Sergeant Hensley attacked the nest alone and succeeded in driving off the enemy with hand grenades.

Private, first class, Company II, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
Going from one wounded comrade to another, exposed to heavy machine-gun and deadly sniper fire, he administered aid to all that he could reach before being killed in the performance of this heroic mission.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Mary Hensley.

First lieutenant, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.
With only a handful of men, Lieutenant Hepburn charged a machine-gun nest, killing or wounding the whole crew. He silenced the fire of 5 different guns, and, in taking the last, he was severely wounded about the head. He continued, however, until his mission was accomplished and the gun silenced.

First licutenant, Air Service, U. S. Army, attached to 56th Squadron, Royal Air Forces, British Expeditionary Forces.

For extraordinary heroism in action near Chaulnes, France, Aug. 1-8, 1918, when with a formation of 6 machines he attacked 18 enemy Fokker biplanes shooting one down in flames. During the fighting Lieutenant Herbert was shot in the leg and his plane was struck in the petrol tank, necessitating skillful maneuvering to regain his own lines. As he was landing he became unconscious from loss of blood. On Aug. 4, 1918, at Cappy, France, he destroyed an enemy Pfalz scout plane at an altitude of 9,000 feet, thus saving his patrol leader, who was at the mercy of the enemy plane. On Aug. 1, he joined in the attack of the enemy aerodrome at Epinoy, the altitude at time of attack being but 200 feet; he killed two enemy mechanics by machine-gun fire and shot up hangars and billets. The bravery, skill, and determination of this officer were an inspiration to other members of his squadron.

After one man had been killed and two others wounded in attempting to render first aid to a lieutenant who lay mortally wounded in an area that was subjected to fire from eneuty machine guns and snipers, he successfully reached the lieutenant and gave him first aid, risking his own life in doing so.

Sergeant, Company D, 102d Infantry, 26th Division. By the effective use of his bayonet, Sergeant Herman killed many of the enemy, and although painfully wounded, he continued to fight until ordered to the rear by his commanding officer.

First lieutenant, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.
When the company on his left was checked by heavy machine-gun fire, Lieutenant Hermle led a platoon forward and surrounded a large number of the enemy, capturing 155 prisoners and 17 machine gams. Pushing on, he took the town of St. George's and many machine-gun positions. Although he was painfully wounded, he refused to be evacuated and remained with his men for 2 days until he was ordered to the rear.

First lieutenant, 319th Infantry, 80th Division.
Suffering from the effects of mustard gas, he refused to leave his platoon, and later, when his company commander was killed, took command of the company. Under the inspiration of his personal bravery his command of the company. Under the inspiration of his personal bravery his command overcame the most determined resistance and succeeded in getting a foothold in the Bois-des-Ogons while it was under flanking fire from machine guns and artillery. He personally visited his outposts under a heavy artillery and machine-gun barrage, inspiring confidence, which enabled his men to maintain their position at a critical time.

First sergeant, Machine Gun Company, 58th Infantry, 4th Division. He carried guns and ammunition to the front-line platoons through an intense barrage after several carrying details had failed to get through. He then volunteered to stay with the right-flank platoon, which was under heavy fire in an exposed position. During the afternoon he and one other man pushed forward with a captured machine gun and assisted materially in breaking up several hostile counterattacks during the day.

Private, Company C, 108th Infantry, 27th Division.

During the operations against the Hindenburg line he exhibited great courage and bravery by advancing alone against two enemy machine-gun positions, putting both of them out of action. In accomplishing this he was seriously wounded.

Private, first class, Company C, 308th Infantry, 77th Division.

In order to obtain ammunition and rations, Private Herschkowitz, with another soldier, accompanied an officer in an effort to reestablish communication between battalion and regimental headquarters. They were attacked by a small party of Germans, but drove them off, killing one. When night came they crawled unknowingly into the center of a German camp, where they lay for three hours undetected. Finally discovered, they made a dash to escape. In order to protect the officer, Private Herschkowitz deliberately drew the enemy fire to himself, allowing the officer to escape. Private Herschkowitz succeeded in getting through and delivering his message the next morning.

Private, Company M, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
On his own initiative he left shelter and crossed open ground swept by machinegun fire to rescue a wounded comrade. Though himself severely wounded on the mission, he succeeded in earrying the soldier back to his own lines.

First lieutenant, 148th Infantry, 37th Division.

Accompanied by a soldier, he made two trips through heavy machine-gun firo and rescued two wounded men who had been left lying in an exposed place when the battalion took up a new position.

First lieutenant, 3d Balloon Squadron, Air Service.
On July 31, near Pont-a-Mousson, he was carrying on a general surveillance of his sector from his balloon with a French soldier when an enemy plane dived from a cloud and opened fire on the balloon. In imminent danger, he remained in the basket until he had helped his French comrade, after whom he himself jumped. On Aug. 2l, in the same sector, he was performing an important mission, regulating artillery fire. Enemy planes attacked, and with great gallantry he remained in the basket until his assistant had jumped. On Oct. 29, near Gesnes, he was conducting a reglage from the basket with a student observer. Attacked by enemy planes, after his balloon was burning he would not quit his post until he had assisted his companion to escape. In each of the foregoing instances Lieutenant Higgs at once reascended in a new balloon.

Private, 55th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Together with another soldier, Private Hirst successfully completed the capture of a machine gun, destroying it and killing 2 of the crew. Fighting his way back to his own lines, he furnished valuable information concerning enemy machine-gun emplacements.

Private, first class, Company B, 136th Machine Gun Battalion, 37th Division. When the advance of his platoon was held up by fire from a hostile machinegun nest, Private Iliser advanced alone ahead of the platoon, worked his way around the flank and rear, and single handed killed the officer in command and a gunner and captured 15 prisoners, thereby enabling his platoon to Second lieutenant, pilot, 88th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

Louis G. Bernheimer, first lieutenant, pilot; John W. Jordan, second lieutenant, 7th Field Artillery, observer; Roger W. Hitchcock, second lieutenant, pilot; James S. D. McClendon, deceased, first lieutenant, 16th Infantry, observer; Philip R. Babcock, first lieutenant, pilot; and Joseph A. Palmer, second lieutenant, 15th Field Artillery, observer, All of these men were attached to the 88th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

For extraordinary heroism in action near Fismes, France, Aug. 11, 1918. Under the protection of 3 pursuit planes, each carrying a pilot and an observer, Lieutenants Bernheimer and Jordan, in charge of a photo plane, carried out successfully a hazardous photographic mission over the enemy's lines to the River Aisne. The 4 American ships were attacked by 12 enemy battle planes. Lieutenant Bernheimer, by coolly and skillfully maneuvering his ship, and Lieutenant Jordan, by accurate operation of his machine gun, in spite of wounds in the shoulder and leg, aided materially in the victory which came to the American ships, and returned safely with 36 valuable photographs. The pursuit plane operated by Lieutenants Hitchcock and Burns was disabled while these two officers were fighting effectively. Lieutenant Burns was mortally wounded and his body jammed the controls. After a headlong fall of 2,500 meters, Lieutenant Hitchcock succeeded in regaining control of this plane and piloted it back to his airdrome. Lieutenants McClendon and Plummer were shot down and killful fighting, aided in driving off the German planes and were materially responsible for the successful execution of the photographic mission. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Alta I. Hitchcock.

Sergeant, Company K, 313th Infantry, 79th Division. Sergeant, Company K, 313th Infantry, 19th Division. While his battalion was conducting a relief, he and 4 members of his platoon were wounded by shell fire. After he had taken the 4 wounded comrades to a first-aid station, he immediately returned without treatment to himself, despite his severe suffering from 3 body wounds, and remained with his platoon until the completion of the relief.

Private, Company F, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
With another soldier, he volunteered to go out in advance of our lines to rescue wounded soldiers who had been left there when the company withdrew.
Under heavy fire they made 2 trips, bringing back wounded men. Private Hix was wounded by machine-gun fire when he went out for the third time. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, H. W. Hix.

First lieutenant, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
Under heavy shellfire and in full view of the enemy, he volunteered for and conducted a daylight patrol of I man and himself to reconnoiter the best route for a raid, obtaining very valuable information. Later, when in the course of an attack, our line was held up by the enemy, he led a patrol of 12 men and, under heavy fire, placed his Lewis gun so as to drive out the enemy, advancing 2,000 yards ahead of our front lines to gain information.

First lieutenant, 17th Infantry, U. S. Army.
With his company (provisional company, 17th Infantry), he held his command in a position under heavy hostile fire at a range of from 10 to 100 yards from a strong enemy position for more than 4 hours and gained valuable information as to the enemy's position by fearlessly exposing himself in climbing a tree to make observations.

Corporal, Company C, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
Corporal Hobscheid, under heavy fire, advanced into a hostile sniping post, found and entered a long dugout, and brought out 30 prisoners.

Major, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.

Within 10 minutes after the beginning of the advance, at 5 a. m., he was twice wounded—in the shoulder by a machine-gun bullet and by shrapnel in the leg. Being in command of the asseult battalion and realizing the importance of its operations, he continued to accompany and direct his command throughout the day, notwithstanding his wounds, which caused him great pain and difficulty of movement. At halts he had to be assisted to lie down and get up by his adjutant; nevertheless he remained on duty until the fighting of the day was over. Hodges, Courtney H

Lieutenant colonel, 6th Infantry, 5th Division.

He personally conducted a reconnaissence of the Meuse River to determine the most advantageous location for a crossing and for a bridge site. Having organized a storming party, he attacked the enemy not 100 paces distant, and, although falling, he managed to effect the crossing of the canal, after 20 hours of ceaseless struggling. His fearlessness and courage were mainly responsible for the advance of his brigade to the heights east of the Meuse.

Secor d lieutenant, 314th Engineers, 89th Division.

Lieutenant Hoeynck received orders to make a reconnaissance of the bridge at Pouilly and the road from Pouilly to Inor. He was accompanied on the at Pounty and the rotal from Pounty to Incr. He was accompanied on the expedition by a soldier of his platoon, the two being the first to cross the river at Incr. At this point they gained most valuable information. Recrossing the river, he made his way to Pouilly under machine-gun fire, collecting engineer data of the greatest importance. Just as they approached their destination Lieutenant Hoeynck was killed by machine-gun fire. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Frederick T. Hoeynck.

Undaunted by heavy shellfire, Private Holden, a runner between brigade and regiment headquarters, delivered an important message, walking and crawling through a wood which was being so heavily bombarded with gas and high-explosive shells that it had been evacuated. He returned to his post after delivering his message through the same severe fire.

First lieutenant, 95th Aero Squadron, 1st Pursuit Group, Air Service.

He was ordered to attack several German balloons reported to be regulating effective artillery fire on our troops. After driving off an enemy plane encountered before reaching the balloons, he soon came upon 5 balloons in ascension 1 kilometer apart. In attacking the first, which proved to be a decoy with a basket, his gun jammed; after clearing it, he attacked the second balloon, forcing the observer to jump. His gun again jammed before he could set fire to this balloon. Moving on the third balloon at a height of only 50 meters, he set fire to it and compelled the observer to jump. He was preverted from attacking the two remaining balloons by the further jamming vented from attacking the two remaining balloons by the further jamming of his machine gun.

First sergeant, Company II, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.

Sergeant Holz exposed himself to heavy enemy fre reorganizing a platoon of his company and in leading it forward in the attack. He was wounded by a fragment of a high-explosive shell the following day while again leading his platoon in the attack. Although directed for evacuation to the hospital he refused to go, and gathered together a small group of stragglers and led them forward to the attacking line. Later he was forced to go to the rear on account of weakness from loss of blood.

Private, Company K, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.

As a runner of the 3d Battalion, 125th Infantry, during the taking and holding of the line near La Tuilerie Ferme, he was engaged in carrying important messages, erossing and recrossing Death Valley between Hill 258 and La Cote Dame Marie, the foremost part of the line held by the 3d Battalion. The valley was swept by machine-gun fire, the terrain affording absolutely no protection, requiring a perilous dash of 500 yards over open ground before any cover was reached. It was only by his display of supreme courage that important messages reached the battalion.

Private, Company L, 362d Infantry, 91st Division. He was on duty at one of the posts of a double relay of runners between battalion and regimental headquarters and carried numerous messages through heavily shelled area. Three other soldiers were killed and 5 seriously wounded along his route, but with unfaltering devotion to duty he continued at his work of relaying messages until he was relieved.

Private, Machine Gun Company, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
After 6 runners had been killed or wounded in attempts to get through heavy shellfire with an important message from the regimental commander of the 39th Infantry to the regimental commander of the 59th Infantry, Private Holzman, with Pvt. James J. Snyder, responded to a call for volunteers and succeeded in delivering the message.

Private, Company A, 60th Infantry, 5th Division.
When a small group of his platoon with which he was advancing was surprised by enemy machine-gun fire, Private Honchar, an automatic rilleman, selected a position and opened fire. He silenced a portion of the fire and drew the rest in his direction, thereby enabling his comrades to take cover. After being wounded three times, he called a comrade and directed his fire, after which he crawled back for first-aid treatment.

Captain, 12th Field Artillery, 2d Division.

While acting as executive officer, Captain Hood brought the battery into action under fire, superintended the placing of the guns and the unloading of the ammunition, and executed the fire of the battery under an intense enflading fire. When the entire gun crew of his first piece was wiped out, he hastily formed a supplementary gun squad and succeeded in getting the first piece into action again within 4 minutes.

First lieutenant, 106th Infantry, 27th Division.
He exhibited great courage and gallantry in taping off the line of departure for his company under a heavy shell and machine-gun fire. Later in the attack this daring officer was killed at the head of his company.

He directed the machine-gun attack in person. Entering Marcheville ahead of the troops, he rendered great assistance while the town changed hands four times. When he was in a small party cut off and surrounded by the enemy and under fire from every direction, by his coolness and resource-fulness he assisted materially in aiding the party to withdraw. He effectively organized machine-gun defenses when the enemy was endeavoring to drive our troops from the town. During the entire day he was under intense artillevel borderdment, mechine-gun and ride fire and head to hand conartillery bombardment, machine-gun and rifle fire, and hand-to-hand conflict with the enemy.

Captain, 167th Infantry, 42d Division.
He commanded an early morning raid on the town of Haumont, and not only executed the raid successfully, but returned alone a second time to the town to be assured that none of his men had been left wounded. He inflicted severe losses on the enemy and took 17 prisoners.

Private, Company H, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

Acting as company runner on May 28-30, 1918, at Cantigny, France, he showed exceptional bravery in carrying messages through heavy shelled area, where he was also a target for snipers. Although rendered unconscious by shell explosion on one of his trips, he continued on duty as soon as he regained consciousness.

Colonel, 138th Infantry, 35th Division.

After losing touch with his first and second line battalions, due to unusually heavy fog, Colonel Howland, with a mixed detachment (partly noncombatants), penetrated to a point immediately in front of the German line of resistance. While getting better cover for his detachment under heavy shell-fire and direct machine-gun fire, Colonel Howland was wounded in the hand by a shell fragment. After three hours' delay tanks arrived, and Colonel Howland advanced with his detachment, taking the enemy position, with many prisoners. After remaining in the attack for over 7 hours he was evacuated because of the wound in his hand.

Private, Company A, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
Private Hoy saw a hand grenade dropped near an officer of his company, which endangered not only the officer's life but also many members of the company who were in the vicinity. Rushing to the spot, he picked up the bomb and harled it in the direction of the enemy. It exploded in the air and the lives of his comrades were thus saved by his act.

Corporal, Company E, 104th Infantry, 26th Division. During action Apr. 12, 1918, he displayed courage and self-sacrificing devotion to duty in going to communication trench with one comrade and holding back advance of enemy through trench until killed at his post.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, William Hoyt.

Private, first class, Company C, 16th Infantry, 1st Division. While carrying a message for his platoon commander Private Huard was fired upon by an enemy machine-gun nest. He dropped to the ground and opened fire on it, and in the fight which ensued killed 2 of the crew and forced the remaining 3 to surrender, sending them to the rear. After delivering his messege he returned to his organization and took command of a squad, which he led throughout the action.

Sergeant, Company C, 115th Machine Gun Battalion, 30th Division. During heavy hostile bombardment, he voluntarily left his dugout and went through the shellfure to the assistance of his wounded platoon commander. After taking the officer to a partially sheltered position, he ran 400 yards through the barrage to secure a litter and assisted the stretcher bearer in carrying the wounded officer to a dressing station.

Private, Company L, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

11e went forward under intense machine-gun and artillery fire and assisted in the removal of a wounded soldier over a distance of 1 kilometer.

First lieutenant, acting regimental adjutant, 17th Field Artillery, 2d Division. Although starting on a mission which would have taken him away from the place of danger, Lieutenant Hubbard went to the aid of a wounded soldier and was himself severely wounded in the head. Almost blinded by blood, he assisted the soldier to a place of safety and later insisted upon being allowed to support with the compact. to remain with the regiment.

Sergeant, Company G, 120th Infantry, 30th Division.
After being twice wounded, Sergeant Hudnall continued to lead his platoon in attack, capturing two machine guns. In later action he received additional wounds which caused his death.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Miss Eva Hudnall.

Captain, 137th Infantry, 35th Division.

Captain, 137th Infantry, 35th Division.

Captain Hudson personally led an attack on a machine-gun nest which was holding up the advance and captured it, taking 9 prisoners and 3 guns. On the two following days he led his battalion in attacks under direct shell and machine-gun fire until he was wounded in the foot. As litter bearers were carrying him to the rear they met a severely wounded soldier, whereupon Captain lindson ordered the litter bearers to carry the wounded soldier to the dressing station while he walked.

First lieutenant, 27th Aero Squadron, Air Service.

A protection patrol of which Lieutenant Hudson was a member was attacked by a large formation of enemy planes; he was separated from the formation and forced to a low altitude by 4 enemy planes (type Fokker). He shot down 1, drove off the other 3, and started to our lines with a damaged machine, but was attacked by 2 biplace planes. He shot down both of these planes and by great perseverance and determination succeeded in reaching our lines.

Sergeant, first class, Company C, 105th Field Signal Battalion, 30th Division. Sergeant Hudson and a number of other members of a signal detachment were wounded by shellfire while proceeding through an enemy counterbarrage to the front line, but, disregarding his own injuries, this soldier administered first aid to his wounded comrades and then extended a telephone line to the advance message center, and with 5 men maintained and operated the message center.

Major, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

For 3 days near Cantigny, France, May 28-30, 1918, he withstood German assaults under intense bombardment, heroically exposing himself to fire constantly in order to command his battalion effectively. Although his command had lost half its officers and 30 per cent of its men, he held his position and prevented a break in the line at that point.

Sent forward through terrific machine-gun and artillery fire to take command of a platoon in the front lines, be displayed marked personal courage and heroism, inspiring the mon serving under him by his example of fearlessness. Diving a heavy counterattack he showed great gallantry, cooly placing his guns where they could best fire upon the advancing enemy, although subjected the while to intense enemy fire. He succeeded in breaking up the enemy attack, and although wounded by a machine-gun bullet refused to be evacuated until the enemy had withdrawn.

Private, medical detsehment, 310th Infantry, 78th Division.
During the night of Sept. 17, Private Huff cave proof of great devotion to duty by leaving protection and assisting another contrade in bringing a wounded soldier to safety. Again, on the morning of Sept. 27, he left shelter and journeyed over 500 yards to the side of a wounded comrade, through shellfire, carrying the victim to the first-aid station.

Sergeant, Company C, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
Sergeant Huffman organized an automatic-rifle squad under heavy machinesergeant Huffman organized an automatic-rifle squad under heavy machinesergeant. The guns and crew were captured. The enemy gun was firing with serious effect on the right flank of his company, causing heavy losses. Later he took charge of a bombing squad and raided an enemy machine-gun position, capturing the guns and crew. In this latter operation he was severely wounded.

Private, 97th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. During the action at Bottresches, France, on June 6, 1918, he volunteered to leave shelter to bring in wounded, and upon receiving permission to do so he carried injured comrades through artillery and machine-gun fire at great risk to his own life.

Private, 79th Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

After being severely wounded in the occupation of Bouresches, France, on June 6, 1918, he refused to go to the rear, but remained and assisted with the wounded, displaying great self-sacrifice and devotion to duty.

Mechanic, Company C, 146th Infantry, 37th Division.

This soldier was constantly on duty as a runner during the offensive west of the Meuse River, many times carrying messages through heavy machinegun and shellfire. On Sept. 30, when the enemy was reported to be forming for a counterattack on the left flank, he volunteered to take the information to the battalion commander. Passing through heavy shellfire, he delivered the message in time to enable the battalion commander to protect the threathened flank, but he was killed by a shell on his return trip to his company. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Kathryn Hughes.

Corporal, 20th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Maríne Corps, 2d Division. He conducted a patrol to the front, located machine-gun nests, and gained contact with the enemy under very severe artillery and machine-gun fire, and set an example of calmness and courage under these hazardous conditions.

Sergeant, Company B, 348th Machine Gnn Battalion, 91st Division. He was seriously gassed Sept. 27, but refused to leave his post and continued working and fighting with his comrades under heavy shelling for 3 days till complete exhaustion forced him to be evacuated.

Private, first class, Company L, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
Though he had been wounded in the leg and ordered to be evacuated, Private Hughes remained with his company in the advance, displaying marked fortinde. Twenty-four hours later his leg had become so stiff that he was compelled to go to the rear. This soldier had previously displayed marked courage by remaining with his automatic rifle under heavy fre, after 2 members of his squad had become casualties, until he had si eaced an enemy machine gun.

Private, Company M, 118th Infantry, 30th Division.
Because his company had already suffered heavy casualties and he realized that all men possible were needed on the firing line, he refused to be evacuated when seriously wounded, and continued in the advance till the objective had been reached and consolidated 8 hours later.

After his platoon commander had fallen he took command of his platoon and led it to its objective through a heavy enemy barrage, although himself twice wounded.

Private, Machine Gun Company, 370th Infantry, 93d Division.
While under heavy enemy fire, Private Hurdle volunteered and, accompanied by another soldier, rescued a wounded comrade from an exposed position.
He also performed valuable service as liaison agent, and, under very heavy fire, succeeded in cases where others had failed.

Corporal, Company E, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.
He took part in a daring raid into the enemy's lines in the region of Grand Pont-Moulin Rouge on the night of Feb. 23, 1918. He showed great valor and fearlessness, and particularly distinguished himself by leading the patrol into a German dugout whose occupants had refused to surrender and from which 16 prisoners were taken.

Captain, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
His company having reached its objective, he ordered several patrols forward to silence several enemy machine guns which were causing heavy ensualties in his own and other companies of his battalion. The patrols meeting heavy casualties from the intense enemy fire, Captain Hurley himself organized a patrol and led it forward. While temporarily checked by the intense fire, a pair of and red to forward. While temporarily enegated by the intense me, he crawled forward and rescued a wounded officer, carrying him to a place of shelter. Resuming the advance of the patrol Captain Hurley was severely wounded, but continued to direct the movement of his men, who, inspired by the great courage and fortitude of their leader, pushed forward and captured the machine-gun nest, killing or capturing the crews thereof.

Private, 55th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He displayed exceptional bravery in charging 3 machine guns with the aid of a small detachment of his comrades, killing the erews and capturing the guns, which were immediately turned on the Germans, thereby opening the line for the advance of his company, which had been held up by the enemy's fire.

First lieutenant, Infantry, attached to 83d Company, 6th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

In the Bois-de-Belleau, France, on June 6, 1918, he displayed coolness, judgment, and utter fearlessness in leading his platoon to its objective under heavy fire.

Private, first class, Company G, 126th Infantry, 32d Division. Upon being sent with a message under heavy machine-gun fire to a platoon commander, he found the latter lying wounded. Unassisted, he carried the officer to a shell hole, bound up his wound, and returned to his company commander with important information.

While in this condition he assisted other wounded soldiers in every wav possible before proceeding to the first-aid station, whence he was evacuated to the hospital.

Private, Company D, 23d Infantry, 2d Division.

After having his nose shot off, he perseveringly continued his work throughout the night as a runner under heavy fire, in order to maintain communication.

Private, medical detachment, 128th Infantry, 324 Division. When his battalion was forced to retire under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire, Private Jacobson went out in front of the line, administering first aid and bringing in the wounded who had been left lying in exposed positions. While so engaged he received 2 wounds, the second of which caused his death before he reached the aid station.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Jacob Jacobson.

Sergeant, Company L, 104th Infantry, 26th Division.

Corporal, Company A, 101st Infantry, 26th Division. He continued to earry messages after being wounded in the back by a machine-gun bullet, until he was again wounded by a bursting shell so seriously that his evacuation was necessary.

First sergeant, Battery A, 101st Field Artillery, 26th Division.

During the action of Apr. 21, 1918, when a shell struck gunpit of a battery, although scriously wounded in the chest and legs by fragments, he immediately obtained stretchers for the other men, doing everything possible for their comfort until he fell. He declined medical attention until all others had been labeled for setting a splendid compute of self-senging. looked after, setting a splendid example of self-sacrifice.

Captain, 110th Engineers, 35th Division. Capiain, 10th Engineers, 35th Division.

Although severely wounded within a few moments from the start of the engagement, he refused to be evacuated, but remained in command of his company and, in addition, throughout the day assisted in reorganizing scattered elements. On Sept. 30, during two counterattacks, he supervised the resistance of his sector in spite of his weakened condition and continually inspired his command by his disregard of machine-gun and artillery fire.

Sergeant, Company L, 4th Infantry, 3d Division. After many attempts to get patrols across the Marne had failed, Sergeant James alone swam the river, taking with him a wire, by which a boat containing 2 of his comrades was drawn across without attracting the attention of the enemy.

Private, Headquarters Company, 368th Infantry, 92d Division. He went to the aid of a wounded companion under very severe machine-gun and artillery fire and brought him to cover. He stayed with the wounded man, giving him all possible aid until assistance came, when he returned to his place with the platoon.

Pharmacist's mate, first class, U. S. Navy, attached to 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

Regardless of his personal danger, he repeatedly exposed himself to machinegun and shellfire to give first aid to the wounded in the open.

Sergeant, Company A, 355th Infantry, 89th Division.
Coming up in the rear of two platoons of a battallion of the first line, Sergeant Janssen, belonging to another battalion, noticed the two platoons were held up by machine-gun fire from the front and flank and appeared to be without a leader. Fearlessly exposing himself, he ran from one end of the line to the other urging the men forward until both platoons had moved across a small gully out of danger from the machine-gun fire. His bravery and leadership thus prevented the interruption of the advance of the entire first line.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 9th Infantry, 2d Division. While acting as a battalion runner, Corporal Janssen carried a message through a heavy barrage, and, although wounded, succeeded in returning with an answer. After his wound had been dressed he remained on duty throughout the engagement.

First sergeant, Company I, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.
When the platoon commander was killed, Sergeant Jardine was placed in command of a platoon and, without regard for his personal safety, led it to the proper place through a violent barrage and successfully maintained the leadership of it throughout the hattle.

Mechanic, Company M, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.
As a runner for the Third Battalion, 125th Infantry, during the taking and holding of the line near La Tuilerie Farm, he was engaged in carrying important messages, crossing and recrossing Death Valley, between Hill 288 and La Cote Dame Marie, the foremost part of the line held by the Third Battalion. The valley was swept by machine-gun fire, the terrain affording absolutely no protection, requiring a perilous dash of 500 yards across open ground before any cover was reached. It was only by a display of supreme courage that important messages reached the battalion.

First lieutenant, 11th Machine Gun Battalion, 4th Division.

He, with another officer and a soldier, using eaptured German Maxim guns, pushed forward to a heavily shelled area from which the lufantry had withdrawn, and by their accurate and effective fire kept groups of the enemy from occupying advantageous positions. Maintaining fire superiority all afternoon, he withdrew from his dangerous position only when it became too dark to see dark to see.

First lieutenant, 30th Infantry, 3d division.

After all means of liaison had failed he curried important messages to his observation posts. He was killed by shellifre while visiting one of his observation stations near Crezancy.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Harriet A. Jauss.

Corporal, Company F, 4th Engineers, 4th Division.

He was a member of a small detachment of Engineers which went out in advance of the front line of the Infantry through an enemy barrage from 77-millimeter and 1-pounder guns to construct a footbridge over the River Vesle. As soon as their operations were discovered machine-gun fire was opened up on them, but, undannted, the party continued at work, removing the German wire entanglements and completing a bridge which was of great value in subsequent operations.

Major, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.
With utter disregard of his own safety he left the shelter of his command post and personally directed the attack of his battalion against the strongly fortified enemy position in and about Chateau du Diable north of the Vesle River. From the beginning of the attack he stood on a railroad embankment within 70 meters of the enemy line, fully exposed to their observation, and under a continuous and intense fire of concealed machine guns, rifles, and artillery. From this position he continued to direct, control, and encourage his officers and men during the progress of the attack, and even after he had been wounded and until exhausted by loss of blood. He refused to be evacuated until he had given full instructions to his second in command and until all wounded enlisted men had been evacuated. His exceptional example of physical and mental courage was an inspiration to all his officers and men under the most trying and dangerous conditions.

First licutenant, 94th Aero Squadron, Air Service.
While on patrol he encountered 10 enemy machines (Fokker type) at an altitude of 2,000 feet. Despite numerical superiority and by a display of remarkable courage and skillful maneuvering, he separated one of the planes from the formation and after a brief encounter shot it down in flames.

Captain, 326th Infantry, 82d Division.

On the night of Oct. 10 Captain Jeffers reconnoitered a badly damaged bridge, and early in the morning of the 11th he supervised its repair, being continuously under an intense machine-gun fire. He later led the leading company of the battalion over this bridge and across an open and level terrain, where all of his officers and almost two-thirds of his men became casualties and himself was seriously wounded. He continued to lead his company forward, however, until he fell, shot through the jaw with a machine-gun bullet.

First lieutenant, 33d Infantry, U. S. Volunteers. With great gallantry and fearlessness Lieutenant Jeffers led 7 men up a narrow trail against unknown numbers of the enemy, flanked their position, and killed or captured the entire number.

First lieutenant, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.

After being severely wounded in the breast and shoulder from shellfire he continued with and commanded his platoon until its final objective was reached and its consolidation was completed.

Private, Company M, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.
At a time when his platoon was held up by machine-gun fire from the front, Private Jeffery with 2 other comrades went forward and attacked the machine-gun position from the flank, capturing [1 officer, 2 sergeants, and 6 privates, and enabling his platoon to further advance without loss of men.

Corporal, Company A, 137th Infantry, 35th Division.

After gallantly leading a section of the line in the advance, Corporal Jeffords was wounded in several places by machine-gun bullets, while he was taking position for his squad, but he refused medical attention and continued to display unusual fortitude until he died several minutes later.

Corporal, Headquarters Company, 110th Infantry, 28th Division. He was a member of a section operating 37-millimeter guns which was attacked by the enemy. After removing the guns to safety he learned that the officer commanding the section had been captured, whereupon he organized a party of 5, attacked the enemy's patrol, numbering 35, and succeeded in delivering the captured officer, killing 15 of the enemy and personally capturing 2. Later in the same evening, in entire disregard for his own safety, he assisted a sergeant in organizing 75 men for a counterattack, which they launched in the face of heavy fire at close range, driving the enemy back for more than a kilometer.

Sergeant, Company G, 317th Infantry, 80th Division.
Patrolling by himself in front of the line, he came upon a machine-gun emplacement manned by a German officer and 3 men. He wounded the officer and 1 soldier by rifle fire, captured the other 2 men, and took them, with the machine gun, to the rear.

Colonel, 30th Infantry, 3d Division.

He personally led a reconnaissance patrol through the eastern and northern edges of Bois-de-la-Pultiere in order to obtain most necessary information while the area was being continuously bombarded by high-explosive and gas shells and raked by machine-gun fire. His courage and bravery was a splendid example and an inspiration to the officers and men of his command.

Sergeant, Company F, 370th Infantry, 93d Division.

He was in command of a detachment and was ordered to attack the German line. After rescuing, under fire, a wounded comrade he charged with his detachment, took a fortified tunnel, and, though far in advance of our lines and without rations and ammunition, held the position for more than 36 hours, until relieved, making use of captured guns and ammunition to repel the counterattacks made upon him.

Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.
While installing a telephone line his regiment started an attack. The enemy responded with a terrific barrage and before the communication was completed Sergeant Jenkins was in the midst of a heavy encounter. Bravely he remained at his post, endeavoring to establish telephone service, but was instantly killed by shellfire. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to sister, Mrs. Eunice G. Strother.

Private, first class, Machine Gun Company, 357th Infantry, 90th Division. He volunteered to go forward with 3 other soldiers to reduce 2 machine-gun nests which successively held up our advance. Captain, 307th Infantry, 77th Division.

He commanded the second battalion of his regiment with conspicuous gallantry. With utter disregard for his own safety, he continued throughout the action to direct his troops personally, moving about from place to place under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire. Exposing himself to the hostile fire, he encouraged his men in their efforts to break through the enemy's line and succeeded in maintaining their aggressive spirit by his personal example of fearlessness. example of fearlessness.

First lieutenant, 7th Infantry, 3d Divis on. He fearlessly led his company in an attack under a heavy bombardment, en-couraging his men by his example. He was killed by shellfire while in the performance of this act.

mission he was seriously wounded.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, Karsten Jensen.

Corporal, Company A, 121st Machine Gun Battalion, 32d Division.
Passing through heavy fire and through wire entanglements, he led his section to a position 500 meters in advance of the Infantry, where he set up his guns and effectively covered the advance. He showed marked bravery and skill in leading his men, capturing 22 prisoners without sustaining a casualty.

Private, Company K, 26th Infantry, 1st Division. He was so seriously wounded that he could not operate his automatic rifle, but refused to be evacuated, and continued with the rifle team, taking the place of first leader. Becoming very weak from the loss of blood, he was ordered to the rear by his platoon commander, but on his way back picked up a rifle and continued in the fight until the enemy had been driven back.

Private, Company B. Replacement Battalion, American Expeditionary Forces,

He drove an automobile repeatedly through a zone swept by the fire of rifles, machine guns, and fieldpieces of contending Russian Government and insurgent troops, rescuing many noncombatants who were entrapped in the Vladivostok station between the lines, carrying them to places of safety, thus undoubtedly saving many lives.

Second lieutenant, 122d Field Artillery, 33d Division.
Lieutenant Johns was in command of a platoon in support of an assaulting battalion of Infantry. During the attack he went far ahead of the Infantry to establish an observation post, where he directed fire from his guns, thereby rendering valuable assistance to the advancing battalion. After several attempts, he went through a heavy enemy barrage and enflading machinegun fire, but when returning to his post he was killed.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Haydn Johns.

Private, Company L, 372d Infantry, 93d Division.

After several other runners had been killed or wounded, he volunteered to carry a message over fields swept by heavy machine-gun fire and artillery bombardment. He succeeded in delivering the message, but was severely wounded while on the return trip.

Sergeant, Company D, 18th Infantry, 1st Division.
Sergeant Johnsen led his section in the attack through heavy artillery fire.
Although severely wounded by a high-explosive shell, he remained with his organization until he was unable to continue forward, due to the loss of blood.

Private, Company G, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

This soldier volunteered to accompany a party whose mission was to bombard a hostile machine-gun emplacement. Under heavy shellfire, be approached to within 30 feet of the emplacement, when he was fired upon through loopheles in a stone wall. Working his way behind the wall, he enflished the enemy with rille fire and effected their capture with the machine gun.

Private, Company A, 308th Infantry, 77th Division. Under heavy fire from the enemy, Private Johnson, accompanied by 1 man, crossed the Vesle River and silenced a machine gun which was causing heavy casualties in his company. They killed one gunner and wounded the other.

Corporal, Company G, 5th Ammunition Train, 5th Division.
When an enemy shell struck some pyrotechnics stored in the ammunition dump of his organization, he directed and assisted in the removal of inflammable material and placing the fire under control. Through his coolness and courage the destruction of a large quantity of near-by ammunition was availed. avoided.

Private, Headquarters Company, 370th Infantry, 98d Division.
Acting as ammunition carrier, he received a painful injury in the back from a shell fragment. While engaged in earrying ammunition he found a wounded man in an exposed position and, regardless of his own wound, carried this man under heavy shellfire to the first-aid station, a distance of more than a kilometer, returning to his work immediately afterwards.

Private, sanitary detachment, 116th Infantry, 29th Division.
He repeatedly exposed himself to heavy machine-gun fire in giving first aid to the wounded and carrying them to the rear. Through his devotion to duty and disregard of danger many lives were saved.

Sergeant, Battery A, 101st Field Artillery, 26th Division.
While his battery position was under shellfire and its ammunition dump had been hit and shells were exploding in it and the crew was ordered to leave, Sergeant Johnson remained, put out 3 fires in the dump, and afterwards, under heavy fire, searched for and brought wounded to shelter.

Private, first class, Headquarters Company, 106th Infantry, 27th Division. When a strong force of the enemy had cut off his company from the advance units of our troops, Private Johnson volunteered to accompany 2 officers on a hazardous patrol to ascertain the exact location of the enemy and our advance troops. They came under terrific enemy fire, by which one of the officers was killed, but Private Johnson continued forward until he was completely surrounded by the enemy. He succeeded in working his way back and made his report, which was of great value in meeting the critical situation.

When his organization was halted by machine-gun fire from the front Private Johnson, accompanied by a noncommissioned officer, advanced upon and destroyed the enemy machine-gun position, forcing 4 of the enemy to surrender, and thereby insuring the further advance of his unit.

Second lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. He volunteered and led an attack upon enemy machine-gun positions under intense maching-gun and artillery barrage, and, although severely wounded in the leg, succeeded in cleaning out several machine-gun nests, capturing guns and a number of prisoners.

Corporal, Battery C, 305th Field Artillery, 77th Division. Corporal Johnson assisted Lieut. Arthur A. Robinson, of his battery, in reseuing the body of an officer from a burning ammunition dump which was under fire.

Sergeant, Battery B, 151st Field Artillery, 42d Division. He remained in command of his gun section throughout the entire day, after having been severely wounded.

Private, Headquarters Company, 102d Field Artillery, 26th Division. For exceptional bravery and devotion to duty on Apr. 20, 1918, when, although wounded in the arm and leg he continued, while under heavy shellfire, to repair the telephone lines, and succeeded in reestablishing communication.

Private, first class, Company G, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
After his platoon had been halted by unusually heavy fire from machine-gun nests, Private Johnson made his way forward and by the effective use of hand grenades killed the occupants of the nests and made possible the continuance of the advance.

Private, Company A, 102d Infantry, 26th Division.

On three separate occasions Private Johnson displayed the utmost heroism and complete disregard for personal danger by crawling from our lines while under direct observation and machine-gun fire and, by the skillful use of natural cover which the ground afforded, brought back to safety 3 wounded comrades who were lying helpless near the enemy's position, thereby saving them from death or centure. them from death or capture.

Corporal, Company D, 306th Machine Gun Battalion, 77th Division. Two platoons of his company being surrounded by strong enemy forces, Corporal Johnson continued to operate his machine gun with little rest for 5 days. Each day small enemy groups endeavored to capture the machine gun, which was stationed on the right flank of the company; on each occasion Corporal Johnson remained with his gun in the face of deadly enemy fire, delivering bursts of fire which drove the enemy raiders to cover, killing and wounding many of them. Wounded on Oct. 4 by grenade fire, he still remained at his post; he was again wounded on Oct. 5. On Oct. 7, owing to his wounds, his machine gun was temporarily out of action and the ground held by riflemen. On the afternoon of this day the enemy launched an attack against the right flank, using liquid fire, wherenoon Corporal Johnson, in spite of his exhausflank, using liquid fire, wherenoon Corporal Johnson, in spite of his exhaustion due to his wounds, resumed operation of his machine gun, and with such effect as to repulse the enemy.

Corporal, Company M, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
When his battalion was held up after suffering heavy casualties from flanking machine-gun fire, he went out alone with an automatic rifle to a position 250 yards in advance of our lines, and, although subjected to intense fire from three directions, operated his gun and so neutralized the enemy fire while his battalion re-formed. Under heavy shellfire and badly wounded, he constantly assisted for 3 days in cooking for an entire battalion in the front line.

Private, first class, Company B, 47th Infantry, 4th Division.

Although he had been painfully wounded in the back by a bursting shell, Private Johnson continued to perform his duties as a runner under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire, thereby enabling his company commander to maintain control of the company. He remained on duty until late in the night when he was ordered to the dressing station.

Sergeant, Company E, 127th Infantry, 32d Division.
Coming unexpectedly upon a German machine gun, he threw bimself upon it as it started firing, being himself killed but preventing any easualties among the members of his own platoon, the enemy gunners being made prisoners. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Carl Johnson.

First lieutenant, 313th Infantry, 70th Division.

He constantly exposed himself to the enemy fire during the action at Montfaucon, setting an example to his men by his fearlessness. When severely wounded by shellfire he assisted 2 wounded men of his company to the rear and refused to occupy space in the ambulance until these men had been provided for.

Major, 27th Infantry. On three successive occasions he went through a zone swept by intense fire of contending factions to the railroad station and brought out noncombatants through the continuous fire from rifles and machine guns.

Major, 372d Infantry, 98d Division.
He led his battalion with exceptional bravery and judgment through a heavy enemy barrage in an attack on a strong hostile force on the plateau south of Bussy Farm, fearlessly exposing himself to point out enemy machine-gun positions. Having attained his objective, he held his ground in spite of the fact that his command had been badly cut up and participated in the attack on the following day. In spite of the strong resistance, his battalion captured a large number of guns, an ammunition dump, and valuable material. His fearlessness, energy, and leadership inspired his men to successful attack.

Sergeant, medical detachment, 56th Infantry, 7th Division.
When the company to which he was attached withdrew from their position and the medical personnel was ordered to find a place of safety, Sergeant Johnson refused to leave the wounded. He carried a seriously wounded officer 1½ kilometers through a heavy artillery barrage to the battalion aid station.

Sergeant, Company G, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

He personally reconnoitered a heavily guarded enemy position and killed one of the foc. In spite of being seriously wounded, be succeeded in returning to his patrol, informing them of the enemy's position and thereby enabling them to capture the entire enemy force.

Sergeant, Company B, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
His company having been held up by concentrated machine-gun and artillery fire, Sergeant Johnson and another soldier went forwar d and made a reconnaissance, locating a way forward which was protected from direct fire. Although he was badly wounded, Sergeant Johnson returned and led his company along this route, thereby enabling the entire battalion to advance.

Private, Battery C, 119th Field Artillery, 32d Division.
When an enemy shell burst at the rear end of the gun pit, wounding him and all the members of the gun crew except the chief of the section, Private Johnson concealed the fact that he had received two severe wounds in the back after he had assisted in removing his wounded comrades. He then resumed his duties and continued serving the piece for about 10 minutes until he collapsed.

Sergeant, Company A, 318th Infantry, 80th Division.
While leading a patrol, Sergeant Johnson encountered terrific machine-gun fire, which forced him to order his patrol to cover. He then advanced alone, working his way to the nest, which he destroyed, thereby permitting the patrol to continue its operation. Later the same day he braved the perils of an extremely heavy barrage to bring to safety a wounded comrade who was lying 300 yards in advance of the lines.

Captain, 116th Infantry, 29th Divison.
Captain Johnston led his company through heavy machine-gun and artillery fire in the attack to his objective. Upon reaching a position scheduled for a passage of the lines he located a strong enemy position. Upon his own initiative he led his company in a bayonet attack and captured about 200 prisoners.

Making his way through a heavy barrage, he brought valuable information as to the enemy's position to his company commander. He then returned to the enemy's position, showing absolute disregard for his own personal danger and brought back 2 wounded men who had fallen there.

Sergeant, Company B, 112th Infantry, 28th Division.
Ordered to clear Hill 244 of the enemy, Sergeant Jones led a patrol of 7 men up a steep slope under enemy grenade fire by which 4 of his men were killed.
Pushing on with the remaining 3, he silenced 3 machine-gun nests and 12 snipers, driving off the remainder of the Germans. He then sent one of his men back with a message and with the other 2 held the position for 2 hours until he was relieved. Corporal, Company M, 358th Infantry, 90th Division. With the assistance of one other soldler, Corporal Jones attacked a machine-gun nest from the flank and captured the gun, together with 11 prisoners.

Second lieutenant, pilot, 22d Aero Squadron, Air Service.
Lieutenant Jones, while attacking 4 enemy planes (Fokker type), was in turn attacked from above and obliged to dive through a formation of 15 planes (Fokker type). His plane was riddled with bullets, but he managed to destroy one of the enemy machines.

Oak-leaf cluster. Oak-leaf cluster.

For the following act of extraordinary beroism in action near St. Mihiel, France, Oct. 18, 1918, Lieutenant Jones is awarded an oak-leaf cluster to be worn with the distinguished-service cross: He was a member of a patrol which succeeded in hedging in a fast enemy biplace plane. Approaching the enemy plane, Lieutenant Jones signaled the enemy to give up and land. The reply was a burst of machine-gun fire, which cut his wind shield and set fire to his plane. He then closed in and shot the German pilot and sent the plane crashing to the ground. He landed in his own plane and extinguished the flames. *Jones, Daniel L. Sergeant, Headquarters Company, 110th Infantry, 28th Division. In command of a detachment of signalmen in the crossing of the Vesle River, Sergeant Jones was severely gassed while transmitting an important message to the rear. He, however, continued with his message the entire distance to the regimental headquarters, where he arrived exhausted and suffering severely from burns and gas inhalation. Although tagged at the dressing station for evacuation, he refused to be evacuated and returned to the front line, later bringing 3 other men blinded by gas to the rear. Sergeant Jones subsequently died from the injuries received.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Daniel L. Jones.

Sergeant, Company E, 26th Infantry, 1st Division.

After being wounded on July 19, 1918, near Soissons, France, he refused to be evacuated, led his platoon in attack, and continued fighting until incapacitated by a second severe wound.

First lieutenant, 102d Field Artillery, 26th Division.

Though himself painfully wounded by a bursting shell when his battery position was heavily bombarded by the enemy, he immediately directed the the work of rescuing wounded men from demolished dugouts and evacuating them to the rear. Having finished this work, he at once reorganized his battery and carried out orders for immediate fire on the enemy.

Corporal, Company G, 132d Infantry, 33d Division.
He showed extraordinary personal bravery when his platoon was held up by fire from a machine-gun emplacement. Crawling forward alone from his own line, he worked his way to the flank of the enemy position and then rushed it, bayoneting one German and taking two prisoners. His action enabled his platoon to advance at once.

Private, first class, Company C, 123d Machine Gun Battalion, 33d Division. Under direct observation of the enemy and under heavy enemy artillery and machine-gun fire he rescued a wounded soldier who was lying exposed to heavy fire and close to the enemy's lines. With great bravery he succeeded in carrying the wounded man to a place of comparative safety whence he was removed to the hospital.

Corporal, Battery D, 109th Field Artillery, 28th Division.

He left an observation post, and, exposing himself to intense artillery and machine-gun fire, dressed the wounds of an officer who had fallen in the open. Then, with the aid of another soldier, he carried the wounded officer to a dressing station. His action saved the life of the officer.

Second lieutenant, 6th Field Artillery, 1st Division.

During a heavy enemy bombardment he exposed himself fearlessly to go to the assistance of a wounded soldier, being killed by shell fire while engaged in this heroic action. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Joseph E. Jones.

Corporal, Company C, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.

He was in charge of a detached automatic-rifle post heavily bombarded by the enemy. Two of his men were killed by shellfire, 2 others and he himself seriously wounded. Though it was his first experience under fire, he exhibited unhesitating devotion to duty by remaining at his post. Sending for assistance, he reorganized his position and gave aid and comfort to the wounded. wounded.

Private, first class, Company E, 115th Infantry, 29th Division. While his platoon was being held up by machine-gun fire he voluntarily left his position and, crawling through intense machine-gun fire, he single handed eaptured 2 machine guns, killing 4 of the enemy, and taking both crews.

Private, Company B, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.

After 2 other soldiers had been killed and 1 wounded in attempts to rescue their wounded platoon leader, Private Jones went forward under heavy machine-gun fire and carried his lieutenant to a place of safety.

Private, first class, Company A, 31st Infantry.
Though wounded early in action he continued to operate his automatic rifle throughout the fight.

Corporal, Company C, 371st Infantry, 93d Division.
Corporal Jones was engaged as company clerk and was left behind to care for the company records. When he learned that all the company officers had become casualties he immediately went forward, and collecting the scattered elements of the company, reorganized them under most trying and difficult conditions. conditions.

First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 368th Infantry, 92d Division. Lieutenant Jones went into an open area subjected to direct machine-gun fire to care for a wounded soldier who was being carried by another officer. While dressing the wounded runner, a machine-gun bullet passed between his arms and chest and a man was killed within a few yards of him.

Wagoner, Supply Company, 166th Infantry, 42d Division.

During the great German artillery bombardment of July 15 he was driving a ration cart to the front lines when he was caught in the heavy bombardment. Both his nules were killed and he was blown from his seat by a shell explosion, the same shell killing a comrade on the cart ahead of him. Catching a stray mule and borrowing another, he returned with his comrade to the company, after which he delivered his rations. After his team became frightened and ran away, he remained in the fight throughout the attack of the day. While delivering rations he was wounded, but he completed his task hefore he would allow his wound to be dressed.

Corporal, Company I, 166th Iufantry, 42d Division.
When his platoon came under heavy fire from a machine-gun nest on its flank, he took part of his squad, surrounded the nest, and captured the gun and crew.

Sergeant, Company G, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
Upon his own initiative he advanced under concentrated rifle and machine-gun fire, which was holding up his platoon, and put out of action a nest of light machine-guns on the flank, thereby permitting the platoon to continue forward.

Private, medical detachment, 118th Infantry, 30th Division. In the face of heavy enemy fire Private Jones, together with 3 other stretcher bearers, advanced before our front line and brought back to shelter a wounded Australian officer.

Private, Company II, 119th Infantry, 30th Division.
He repeatedly exposed himself to enemy fire to save his comrades, going forward in advance of our lines to attack machine-gun nests. After reducing 1 enemy nest with rifle grenades, he proceeded to attack another, and while, so doing was killed by enemy snipers.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, George W. Jordan.

Private, Company L, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.

He went forward under intense machine-gun and artillery fire and assisted in the removal of a wounded soldier over a distance of 1 kilometer.

Corporal, Company M, 111th Infantry, 28th Division.
Having learned from a raid of the previous night that a comrade was lying wounded in front of his lines, Corporal Jordan set out to rescue him after seeing two other men killed in the attempt. Crawling in full view of the enemy, he was shot through the leg when a storm of fire was directed at him, but he struggled on and brought his man to safety.

Corporal, 8th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. After all the other members of their gun crews had become casualties, Corporal Jordan and another soldier advanced with their gun through heavy artillery and machine-gun fire to an advanced position and put up their gun in action in support of the Infantry. They remained in this position after the Infantry had retired and until their ammunition was exhausted.

Private, Company H, 117th Infantry, 30th Division.
When his platoon was subjected to heavy machine-gun fire from the front and flanks, Private Jordau courageously operated his automatic rifle from an exposed position with such good effect that fire superiority was maintained until reinforcements arrived.

Corporal, Company A, 1st Gas Regiment.

After other means of communication had failed, he voluntarily carried messages from the regimental post of command to advanced positions through several enemy barrages of gas and high-explosive shells. He continued on duty, even after being wounded, until he was exhausted, tenants Bernheimer and Jordan, in charge of a photo plane, carried out successfully a hazardous photographic mission over the enemy's lines to the River Aisne. The 4 American ships were attacked by 12 enemy battle planes. Lieutenant Bernheimer, by coolly and skillfully maneuvering his ship, and Lieutenant Jordan, by accurate operation of his machine gun, in spite of wounds in the shoulder and leg, aided materially in the victory which came to the American ship and returned safely with 36 valuable photographs. The pursuit plane operated by Lieutenants Hitchcock and Burns was mortally wounded and his body jammed the controls. After a headlong fall of 2,500 meters, Lieutenant Hitchcock succeeded in regaining control of this plane and piloted it back to his airdrome. Lieutenants McClendon and Plummer were shot down and killed after a vigorous combat with 5 of the enemy's planes. Lieutenants Babcock and Primer, by gallant and skillful fighting, aided in driving off the German planes and were materially responsible for the successful execution of the photographic mission. mission.

Captain, 167th Infantry, 42d Division. Seeing a private of his company wounded by shellfire, Captain Jordan left his shelter and rushed to the aid of the wounded man. After administering first aid he carried him through the terrific bombardment a distance of 150 yards to a place of safety.

During the attack near Madeline Farm, he, with a companion, crawled in front of our lines and rescued a wounded American soldier.

Private, Company B, 16th Infantry, 1st Division.
Displaying exceptional initiative and bravery throughout the operations south of Soissons, France, July 18 to 22, 1918, he, with extraordinary heroism, on July 21, 1918, with 2 companions, captured 2 machine guns that were causing heavy losses to his company.

Private, first class, Company A, 4th Infantry, 3d Division.
After being badly gassed, he continued with his duties as runner, exposed to the extreme shelling of high explosive and gas bombs.

Private, first class, Company C, 15th Machine Gun Battalion, 5th Division. After he was severely wounded and his squad leader killed, he took charge of the squad and directed their fire with such telling effect that 3 machine guns, which had caused many easualties in our ranks, were put out of action. In the counterattack which followed he personally manned the machine gun after the other members of the crew had been killed or wounded and continued to operate it until completely exhausted.

Sergeant, Company A, 309th Infantry, 78th Division. Under terrific enemy bombardment he carried a soldier who was overcome by gas for a distance of 50 yards over a road exposed to the direct fire of enemy machine guns, snipers, and shellfire to a place of safety. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Elizabeth Karg.

Corporal, Company C, 107th Infantry, 27th Division.

In the face of hostile machine-gun fire Corporal Karker ran to the assistance of a wounded comrade. He pulled the wounded man into a shell hole, keeping his own body interposed between the wounded man and the enemy's fire, While giving first aid to his wounded comrade, Corporal Karker was killed. Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Harry Kelso.

Sergeant, Company M, 311th Infantry, 78th Division.

Acting as a scout, he obtained valuable information as to the location of enemy positions, and, single-handed, attacked a machine-gun crew, killing I of the enemy and taking the remaining 2 prisoners.

Private, Battery F, 7th Field Artillery, 1st Division. He refused to leave his gun after he had lost a finger during the enemy counter-attack on Cantigny, France, May 28, 1918, but continued to perform his duties until so severely wounded as to be unable to assist in serving his piece.

Private, 55th Company, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division. Private Kaulsky volunteered to rescue a wounded comrade from a violent barrage, and, although he was wounded, he successfully accomplished his mission.

Private, Company L, 363d Infantry, 91st Division. When the progress of 2 front-line companies had been held up by intense when the progress of 2 front-line companies had been field up by linesise machine-gun fire and the enemy had begun to close in on our forces Private Kay, although in an exposed position, checked the advance of the enemy with rifle grenades until he was killed. His act made possible the renewal of the advance by the 2 companies.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, George W. Kay.

First lieutenant, 94th Acro Squadron, Air Service.
While on a mission he, accompanied by another machine piloted by Lieut.
Reed M. Chambers, encountered a formation of 6 enemy machines (Fokker type) at an altitude of 3,000 feet. Despite numerical superiority of the enemy, Lieutenant Kaye and Lieutenant Chambers immediately attacked and succeeded in destroying 1 and forced the remaining 5 to retire into their own lines.

Oak-leaf cluster.

A bronze oak leaf is awarded to Lieutenant Kaye for the following act of extraordinary heroism in action over the region of Montfaucon and Bantheville, France, Oct. 5, 1918: He encountered a formation of 7 enemy machines (Fokker type). Regardless of their numerical superiority he immediately attacked, and by skillful maneuvering succeeded in separating 1 enemy plane from its formation and, after a short combat, shot it down in flames.

After he and a comrade had located a hostile machine gun in a clump of trees 500 meters north of a château, east of Fere-en-Tardenois, they volunteered to attempt to force the enemy to abandon this position, and advanced against it over open ground in the face of fire. By their rifle fire they drove the enemy crew from its gun, killing 1 and wounding another.

Private, Company A, 7th Infantry, 3d Division.

Private Kayser, with an automatic rifle, went forward in advance of our line and opened fire on an enemy machine-gun position in order to cover the flank attack of another platoon. Although mortally wounded, he continued to fire until the platoon had completed its flanking movement.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to mother, Mrs. Alfred Kayser.

Corporal, Battery B, 5th Field Artillery, 1st Division.

He displayed unusual ability and courage by taking the place of officers who had been wounded and laithfully performing their duties while his battery position was under severe flanking fire. He continually exposed himself to violent bombardment until killed.

First lieutenant, 15th Field Artillery, 2d Division.

He accompanied 2 successive waves of Infantry in the attack on Vierzy and Villemontoire, July 18, exposed himself with almost reckless disregard of the enemy's heavy shell and machine-gun fire, secured valuable information for the artillery as to the location of our own and the enemy's lines, and personally took command of an isolated 9th Infantry mechine-gun detachment that had lost its officers by heavy fire. Lieutenant Kean on July 18 and 19 actually accompanied 3 successive waves of the 23d Infantry, the 9th Infantry, and an attack by French infantry without rest. His endurance and courage were exceptional and most inspiring upon this occasion and upon all other occasions of attack by the 2d Division. occasions of attack by the 2d Division.

Private, first class, medical detachment, 131st Infantry, 33d Division. Throughout the engagement he displayed great galantry and devotion to duty by treating the wounded in an area swept by machine-gun and artillery fire. When 2 stretcher bearers who were working with him were killed he impressed German prisoners into the service of carrying wounded to the aid station.

Private, Company B, 102d Infantry, 26th Division. When haison with the front-line companies had been completely broken and several runners had failed to reach them he successfully carried a message through an intense machine-gun and artillery barrage, returning with important information.

Private, Company E, 357th Infantry, 90th Division. He rushed machine-gun nests that were holding up the advance of his company, killed the crews with his automatic rile, and captured the guns. He continued to render valiant service throughout the engagement until he was wounded by a shell fragment.

First lieutenant, 47th Infantry, 4th Division.
When a counterattack was impending he successively carried 15 wounded men across a shell-swept area, in full view of the enemy, taking them to a place of safety and preventing them from being captured by the enemy. Later he reorganized groups of stragglers and lcd them into combat.

First lieutenant, Air Service, with headquarters, American Air Service units, attached to 49th Squadron, British Expeditionary Forces.

For extraordinary heroism in action. On Aug. 9, 1918, he bombed Falvy Bridge over 1,000 feet, obtaining a direct hit. On returning, his formation was attacked by enemy planes and a running fight ensued. By skillfully flying with exceptional coolness he enabled his observer to shoot 2 planes down in flames. On Aug. 8, 1918, after bombing Bethencourt Bridge over 800 feet, obtaining a direct hit, he found 7 enemy planes attacking his formation from the rear. By maneuvering for position he enabled his observer to shoot 1 down in flames over Bethencourt. On July 17, 1918, he bombed Passy from the rear. By maneuvering for position he enamed in sobserver to shoot I down in flames over Bethencourt. On July 17, 1918, he bombed Passy Bridge over 500 feet, destroying it just as a column of transport was passing. He then opened machine-gun fire on the troops in the vicinity, causing many casualities and great disorder. His exceptional courage and splendid bravery were a constant inspiration to the members of his command.

Captain, 114th Infantry, 29th Division.
While he was in command of the machine-gun company of his regiment and every available gunner had been killed or wounded he personally manned one of the guns and kept it in operation until killed.
Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to brother, Raymond M. Keating.

Private, Company G, 357th Infantry, 90th Division.
Becoming separated from his patrol, Private Keaton, with another soldier, attacked an enemy patrol and drove it off, though the number of their opponents was estimated at 50. During the advance of Sept. 12 north of Feyen-llaye he went to the rescue of his battalion commander and another officer, who were pocketed by the fire of a machine gun. He stalked the gun position and drove off the gunners.

Although seriously gassed during shelling by high-explosive and gas shells, he refused to be evacuated and continued, practically single-handed, by his own initiative, to operate the regimental message center relay station at Mont Notre Dame. Throughout this critical period he showed extraordinary heroism, high courage, and persistent devotion to duty, and totally disregarded all personal danger. By his determination he materially aided his regimental commander in communicating with the front line.

Corporal, Company D, 55th Infantry, 7th Division.

With a detail of 7 men, he volunteered and went through severe artillery and machine-gun fire to bring in a platoon which had been cut off for 5 hours, in front of a strongly fortified enemy position. Repeated efforts to reach the platoon during the day had failed, but Corporal Keenan and his party brought in the entire platoon, including several wounded men, among them the platoon commander.

Corporal, Company L, 315th Infantry, 79th Division.
When his platoon had been ordered to cover because of annihilating machinegun and artillery fire Corporal Keenan accompanied another soldier to the rescue of a comrade who was lying 300 yards distant. The journey was made through heavy and continuous fire, but Corporal Keenan, with his fellow soldier, succeeded in bringing their wounded comrade to safety.

First lieutenant, Medical Corps, attached to 369th Infantry, 93d Division. Although suffering from illness, this officer remained on duty day and night throughout the engagement. When his battalion was in reserve, he voluntarily went forward to the assaulting hattalions whose surgeons had been evacuated. In the attack on Sechault he exposed himself continuously to intense artillery and machine-gun fire while rendering first aid.

Private, Company L, 131st Infantry, 33d Division.
Volunteering for the service, he went out in advance of our lines, under heavy machine-gun fire, to cut lanes through wide belts of barbed wire. Despite the enemy fire, to which he was constantly exposed, he accomplished his mission, enabling the attacking waves to resume the advance.

Private, Company A, 9th Machine Gun Battalion, 3d Division. During the strong enemy attack, Private Keirs made a daylight reconnaissance under enemy machine-gun and artillery fire to locate the positions reached by the enemy in their advance across the Marne. He located accurately the enemy line, and the information he secured was of the greatest value to his platoon commander. Later he carried messages, under machine gun fire, to our ortillery. our artillery.

First lieutenant, 125th Infantry, 32d Division.

In the action to force the passage of the Ourcq River and capture the heights beyond, he distinguished himself by his conduct and personal example to his men. Under artillery fire and heavy machine-gun fire he continued to direct his platoon, even though severely wounded, in an effective manner against the enemy, until he was killed by machine-gun fire.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to widow, Mrs. Harry M. Keiser.

First lieutenant, 38th Infantry, 3d Division.
First Lieutenant Keith courageously led his company in the attack on Hill 299, exposed to heavy machine-gun fire. He quickly organized his position, and later repelled an enemy counterattack. Although wounded on the evening of the 22d, he continued with his company until the following day.

Private, Company L, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

Private Keith voluntarily joined a patrol whose mission was to locate enemy machine guns and to secure such other information as might be of value to the attacking forces. The patrol penetrated the enemy's lines to a distance of a kilometer, locating a large number of machine-gun nests. Cut off from their own troops without food or water for 36 hours and under constant enemy fire, 1 officer and 18 of the 36 men of the patrol were either killed or wounded. Private Keith with indomitable spirit made his way to the American forces, in broad daylight under intense enemy fire, furnished valuable information of the enemy to his battalion commander, and voluntarily made his way back to the beleaguered patrol in order to lead them to their own lines; they thus escaped the American barrage which preceded the attack of Oct. 4, 1918. His undaunted courage, leadership, and devotion to duty proved an inspiration to every man of his regiment.

Corporal, Company I, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

Corporal Kell carried numerous important messages over ground swept by heavy machine-gun and artillery fire, returning with valuable information from adjoining units. Due to his gallantry, his company commander was able to keep in close touch with platoon leaders. Corporal Kell on several occasions dressed the wounded under heavy enemy fire.

Sergeant, Company B, 354th Infantry, 89th Division.
When his combat group was heavily fired upon, while crossing open exposed ground, by 2 machine guns, he charged the position from the flank, personally killing 1 gunner and making the capture of the other members of the crews possible. His action made possible the advance of his company.

Private, Company G, 119th Infantry, 30th Division. Voluntarily advancing alone against a machine-gun nest which was causing heavy casualties in his platoon, he hombed the enemy position, killing 5 of the crew and capturing the remaining 3.

Sergeant, Company I, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.

Accompanying a patrol into the village of Pouilly to determine the strength of the enemy, Sergeant Kelley crossed the Meuse by means of a destroyed bridge, which, together with all approaches thereto, was subjected to an intense harassing fire of 1-pounders, machine guns, and snipers. On Nov. 11 be continued a gallant fight against an enemy machine-gun nest after his company commander had been evacuated because of wounds.

Corporal, Battery A, 122d Field Artillery, 33d Division. Having been sent on a reconnaisance, he reached the enemy lines and returned with information of great value.

Corporal, Battery B, 122d Field Artillery, 33d Division. He voluntarily proceeded to a point within 150 meters of the enemy, where he remained for more than an hour, securing valuable information regarding the enemy's position and activity. During all this time he was subjected to severe shell, machine-gun, and snipers' fire, being wounded by a shell while returning to our lines.

Sergeant, Company C, 12th Machine Gun Battalion, 4th Division.
Sergeant Kelly led his platoon in the attack with great bravery against strongly held enemy trenches. Shortly after reaching his objective he was wounded in the throat. He refused to be evacuated, but continued to actively command his men until the night of Oct. 1, by which time, due to his wound, he had left the request of speech. had lost the power of speech.

First lieutenant, chaplain, 104th Machine Gun Battalion, 27th Division. During the operations of his regiment against the Hindenburg line and later east of the La Salle River he was constantly at the front, caring for the wounded and supervising the burial of the dead, often under heavy shell and machinegun fire. His fearless conduct afforded an inspiring example to the combat troops.

First lieutenant, 5th Regiment, U. S. Marine Corps, 2d Division.

After all other officers of his company had become casualties, Lieutenant Kelly took command, and while able to retire to a stronger position, yet he ordered an advance against greatly superior numbers, breaking the enemy's attack and taking many prisoners.

First lieutenant, 18th Field Artillery, 3d Division.

During the hombardment preceding the enemy attack across the Marne the position of Battery B, 18th Field Artillery, was subjected to heavy artillery fire for a period of 4 hours. Al communications were destroyed and the ammunition dump destroyed by hostile fire. Throughout the enemy bombardment Lieutenant Kelly hept his battery in action, exposing himself to concentrated enemy artillery fire in order to replenish his ammunition supply, and delivered an effective fire on the enemy.

Private, Company A, 341st Machine Gun Battalion, 89th Division. With his machine-gun section, Private Kelly was sent to an advanced position, where they were subjected to fire from numerous enemy snipers and machinewhere they were subjected to fire from numerous enemy supers and machine-gun positions, and were also mistaken for the enemy by our own Infantry After the section lieutenant was wounded, he directed the sergeant to signal their identity to the Infantry, and, overhearing the order, Private Kelly rose on the edge of the shell hole to send the message, but was met by bursts of automatic-rife fire. In order to save his comrades from the danger of this fire, he ran down the hill to our own lines, convinced the Infantry of the identity of the troops ahead, and then returned to his section.

Private, Company F, 101st Infantry, 26th Division.

Accompanying 2 other soldiers, Private Kelly rushed forward in advance of his lines, exposed to heavy machine-gun fire, and captured 2 machine guns and 6 of the convey the and 6 of the enemy who were manning the position.

First lieutenant, 9th Infantry, 2d Division.

During a night attack made by his battalion, Lieutenant Kelly, the battalion adjutant, voluntarily left his dugout and went to the front-line positions through the intense artillery fire. There he successfully maintained liaison with the advance troops and the artillery in the rear by means of signals sent from his exposed position. His absolute disregard for his own safety contributed largely to the success of the engagement.

Major, 165th Infantry, 42d Division.
Major Kelly, because of having a very high fever, was ordered to the rear while conducting an attack against strong resistance. He refused, however, to be relieved, remaining in command for two days, after which time he collapsed.
His sickness which resulted necessitated his remaining in the hospital for a period of over a month.

Corporal, Company G, 102d Infantry, 26th Division. Assisted by another soldier, Corporal Kelly rushed a machine-gun nest which had been firing on their patrol. They succeeded in killing the crew.

First sergeant, Company E, 139th Infantry, 35th Division.
He volunteered to carry an important message from his company commander to battalion headquarters and, knowing the extreme importance of the message, proceeded by the most direct route, through the heavy machine-gun fire and artillery barrage, with entire disregard for his personal safety. He was killed while performing this heroic service.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, John A. Kelsey.

First lieutenant, pilot, 91st Aero Squadron, Air Service.

In the course of a photographic mission, Lieutenant Kelty, with his observer, was obliged to penetrate a heavy enemy antiaircraft barrage, realizing that obtaining the location of the artillery objectives was of the greatest importance. When a shell struck his machine, his observer was instantly killed and his machine so badly wrecked that it plunged to the earth, thereby causing his death.

Posthumously awarded. Medal presented to father, James B. Kelty.

Private, Company F, 28th Infantry, 1st Division.

He displayed exceptional bravery and utter disregard of his own life by advancing on a machine-gun nest of 2 guns and 6 men, and by working his way up to the rear of the guns put them out of action in hand-to-hand combat. On July 20, 1918, he again advanced on a machine gun which wasfoling great damage to the men in his sector by sniping, put the gun out of action, and returned to the trenches with the gun.

Private, Company H, 139th Infantry, 35th Division.
Se eing his battallon adjutant lying wounded several yards in front of our line and in great danger from heavy machine-gun and rifle fire, Private Kemmerer with a total disregard for personal danger, went to the assistance of this officer and succeeded in carrying him to safety. This gallant soldier was himself wounded while performing this heroic act.

Private, Company C, 114th Infantry, 29th Division. Although severely wounded in the arm, herefused to go to the rear, and after receiving first-aid treatment rejoined his platoon under heavy shellfire and continued to fight until incapacitated by a second severe wound.

First lieutenant, 356th Infantry, 89th Division.
On Nov. 4 he was severely gassed during a heavy shelling, but remained on duty.
On Nov. 5, still suffering from the effects of the gas, he volunteered and went to a near-by town to assist in the work of supplying reserve rations for the command, working continuously for two days and two nights under terrific fire. During the night of Nov. 10 he guided an element to the pontoon crossing the Meuse, and while returning he was rendered unconscious by a shell explosion. Gaining consciousness, he voluntarily started on a search for a part of his command which had been lost in the dense fog.

Private, Company H, 103d Infantry, 26th Division. While under heavy fire, he cut a path through the enemy's wire entanglements and then crawled through the opening he had made, leading a small detail against an enemy machine gun, which he flanked and put out of action. With two companions he destroyed a second emplacement, and while advancing upon a third was severely wounded by shellfire.

Second lieutenant, 27th Infantry

He was in command of a detachment of his company when attacked by an armored train at 1 a. m. The detachment under his leadership and inspired by his example attacked and disabled the armored train and caused surrender.
